SEC. 18. This act may be cited as the "National Labor Relations Act."

The explanatory statement submitted by Mr. Wagner was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SENATOR WAGNER'S STATEMENT REGARDING NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS

The recovery program has sought to bestow upon the business man and the worker a new freedom to grapple with the great eco-nomic challenges of our times. We have released the business nomic challenges of our times. We have released the business man from the undiscriminating enforcement of the antitrust laws, which had been subjecting him to the attacks of the price cutters and wage reducers—the pirates of industry. In order to deal out the equal treatment upon which a just democratic society must rest, we at the same time guaranteed the freedom of action of the worker. In fact, the now famous section 7 (a), by stating that employees should be allowed to cooperate among themselves if they desired to do so, merely restated principles that Congress has avowed for half a century.

Congress is familiar with the events of the past 2 years. While Congress is familiar with the events of the past 2 years. industry's freedom of action has been encouraged until the trade association movement has blanketed the entire country, employees attempting in good faith to exercise their liberties under section 7 (a) have met with repeated rebuffs. It was to check this evil that the President in his wisdom created the National Labor Board in August 1933, out of which has emerged the present National Labor Relations Board.

Labor Relations Board.

The Board has performed a marvelous service in composing disputes and sending millions of workers back to their jobs upon terms beneficial to every interest. But it was handicapped from the beginning, and it is gradually but surely losing its effectiveness, because of the practical inability to enforce its decisions. At present it may refer its findings to the National Recovery Administration and await some action by that agency, such as the removal of the Blue Eagle. We all know that the entire enforcement procedure of the N. R. A. is closely interlinked with the voluntary spirit of the codes. Business in the large is allowed to police itself through the code authorities. This voluntarism is without question admirable in respect to provisions for fair competition that have been written by industry and with which busiwithout question admirable in respect to provisions for fair competition that have been written by industry and with which business is in complete accord. But it is wholly unadapted to the enforcement of a specific law of Congress which becomes a crucial issue only in those very cases where it is opposed by the guiding spirits of the code authorities. Secondly, the Board may refer a case to the Department of Justice. But since the Board has no power to subpena records or witnesses, its hearings are largely ex parte and its records so infirm that the Department of Justice is usually unable to act. Finally, the existence of numerous industrial boards whose interpretations of section 7 (a) are not subject to the coordinating influence of a supreme National Labor Relations Board, is creating a maze of confusion and contradictions. While there is a different code for each trade, there is only Relations Board, is creating a maze of confusion and contradictions. While there is a different code for each trade, there is only one section 7 (a), and no definite law written by Congress can mean something different in each industry. These difficulties are reducing section 7 (a) to a sham and a delusion.

The break-down of section 7 (a) brings results equally disastrous to industry and to labor. Last summer it led to a procession of bloody and costly strikes, which in some cases swelled almost to the magnitude of national emergencies. It is not material at this time to inquire where the balance of right and wrong rested in respect magnitude of national emergencies. It is not material at this time to inquire where the balance of right and wrong rested in respect to these various controversies. If it is true that employees find it difficult to remain acquiescent when they lose the main privilege promised them by the Recovery Act, it is equally true that employers are tremendously handicapped when it is impossible to determine exactly what their rights are. Everybody needs a law that is precise and certain.

There has been a second and even more serious consequence of the break-down of section 7 (a). When employees are denied the freedom to act in concert even when they desire to do so, they cannot exercise a restraining influence upon the wayward members of their exercise a restraining influence upon the wayward members of their own groups, and they cannot participate in our national endeavor to coordinate production and purchasing power. The consequences are already visible in the widening gap between wages and profits. If these consequences are allowed to produce their full harvest, the whole country will suffer from a new economic decline.

The national labor relations bill which I now propose is novel neither in philosophy nor in content. It creates no new substantive rights. It merely provides that employees, if they desire to do so, shall be free to organize for their mutual protection or benefit. Quite aside from section 7 (a), this principle has been embodied in the Norris-LaGuardia Act, in amendments to the Railway Labor Act passed last year, and in a long train of other enactments of Congress.

way Labor Act passed last year, and in a long train of other enactments of Congress.

There is not a scintilla of truth in the wide-spread propaganda to the effect that this bill would tend to create a so-called "labor dictatorship." It does not encourage national unionism. It does not favor any particular union. It does not display any preference toward craft or industrial organizations. Most important of all, it does not force or even counsel any employee to join any union if he prefers to deal directly or individually with his employers. It seeks merely to make the worker a free man in the economic as well as the political field. Certainly the preservation of long-recognized fundamental rights is the only basis for frank and friendly relations in industry.

The erroneous impression that the bill expresses a bias for some particular form of union organization probably arises because it outlaws the company-dominated union. Let me emphasize that nothing in the measure discourages employees from uniting on an independent- or company-union basis, if by these terms we mean independent or company-union basis, if by these terms we mean independent. simply an organization confined to the limits of one plant or one employer. Nothing in the bill prevents employers from maintaining free and direct relations with their workers or from participating in group insurance, mutual welfare, pension systems, and other such activities. The only prohibition is against the sham or dummy union which is dominated by the employer, which is supported by the employer, which cannot change its rules or regusupported by the employer, which cannot change its rules or regulations without his consent, and which cannot live except by the grace of the employer's whims. To say that that kind of a union must be preserved in order to give employees freedom of selection is a contradiction in terms. There can be no freedom in an atmosphere of bondage. No organization can be free to represent the workers when it is the mere creature of the employer.

Equally erroneous is the belief that the bill creates a closed shop for all industry. It does not force any employer to make a closed-shop agreement. It does not even state that Congress favors the policy of the closed shop. It merely provides that employers and employees may voluntarily make closed-shop agreements in any State where they are now legal. Far from suggesting a change, it merely preserves the status quo.

A great deal of interest centers around the question of majority rule. The national labor relations bill provides that representatives selected by the majority of employees in an appropriate unit shall represent all the employees within that unit for the purposes of collective bargaining. This does not imply that an employee who is not a member of the majority group can be forced to the majority group can be forced to majority the union which the majority group. to enter the union which the majority favors. It means simply that the majority may decide who are to be the spokesman for all in making agreements concerning wages, hours, and other conall in making agreements concerning wages, hours, and other conditions of employment. Once such agreements are made the bill provides that their terms must be applied without favor or discrimination to all employees. These provisions conform to the democratic procedure that is followed in every business and in our governmental life, and that was embodied by Congress in the Railway Labor Act last year. Without them the phrase "collective bargaining" is devoid of meaning, and the very few unfair employers are encouraged to divide their workers against themselves.

Finally, the National Labor Relations Board is established permanently, with jurisdiction over other boards dealing with cases under section 7 (a) or under its equivalent as written into this bill. Nothing could be more unfounded than the charges that the Board would be invested with arbitrary or dictatorial or even unusual powers. Its powers are modeled upon those of the Federal Trade Commission and numerous other governmental agencies. Its orders would be enforceable not by the Board, but by recourse to the courts of the United States, with every affected party entitled to all the safeguards of appeal.

The enactment of this measure will clarify the industrial atmosphere and reduce the likelihood of another conflagration of strife such as we witnessed last summer. It will stabilize and improve business by laying the foundations for the amity and fair dealing upon which permanent progress must rest. It will give notice to all that the solemn pledge made by Congress when it enacted section 7 (a) cannot be ignored with impunity, and that a cardinal principle of the new deal for all and not some of our people is going to be supported and preserved by the Government. #### SOCIALIZATION OF THE ALUMINUM INDUSTRY-ADDRESS BY HARVEY O'CONNOR

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Congressional Record an address on the subject of Socialization of the Aluminum Industry, delivered by Harvey O'Connor, author of Mellon's Millions, over the National Broadcasting System, on February 9, 1935.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

printed in the Record, as follows:

We hear much about monopoly in these times, but the 100 percent brass-bound, copper-riveted monopoly is a comparative rarity. In this gallery of rarities, we must yield first palm to the Aluminum Co. of America, which enjoys the distinction of having cornered the market of aluminum and its sources on the American continent to the financial benefit of a gentleman once well-known in Washington, Mr. Andrew W. Mellon, greatest Secretary of the Treasury since Alexander Hamilton.

Back in 1924 the Federal Trade Commission reported that "The Aluminum Co. of America, with its complete monopoly of the production of aluminum in the United States, fortified by a high protective tariff on imports, controls the domestic price of sheet aluminum." Further back, in 1912, a Federal court in Pittsburgh held the Aluminum Co. to be a trust and ordered it in perpetuity to cease and desist from its oppressive policies in keeping a strangle hold on the pocketbooks of Americans who wished to buy this silvery metal, in its alloys as strong as the strongest steel buy this silvery metal, in its alloys as strong as the strongest steel and only one-third the weight.

In the case of aluminum, the technique of monopoly was first to have the United States Government cloak it with official immunity for some 20 years through patents on the electric process of refining. Sheltered behind this wall, and behind high-tariff walls, kindly provided by Mr. Mellon's various Pennsylvania Senators, the Aluminum Co. of America emerged in uncontested domination of the field. To make its position doubly sure, it grabbed all the commercially available bauxite—the raw mineral of aluminum—on the two American continents, and entered into alliances with the European companies to prevent international competition. with the European companies to prevent international competition and to apportion the world's markets.

RECORD—SENATE

In doing so Mr. Mellon has simplified our problem in socializing this metal—which may some day rank with iron and steel as the material basis of industrial civilization. Here there are no conflicting interests of society be best served by the continued high price and restricted output of aluminum to Mr. Mellon's benefit, or by low price and expanded output for the benefit of 125,000,000 Americans who use aluminum directly and indirectly?

Our railroads are hungry for new equipment, for lightweight trains, for lightweight freight cars which will serve our transportation needs more cheaply and more quickly. They need aluminum—hundreds and thousands of tons of aluminum. The other side of this picture is that we have great aluminum mills in this country, in Pittsburgh, in Tennessee, in North Carolina, at Niagara Palls, standing ready to supply this need. We have tens of thousands of workers in the aluminum towns anxious and willing to work, to mine the bauxite, to refine the aluminum, to roll and fabricate the finished aluminum plate. But between the country's need for aluminum and the aluminum workers' need for work stands Mr. Mellon and his Aluminum Co. of America. This company says in effect: "Our price is 21 cents a pound. It is the price we fix. Take it or leave it!"

It used to work fine. In good times—and by good times I mean years like 1929, when 36,000 families at the top received as much income as 11,000,000 families at the bottom—the artificial price level fixed by Aluminum Co. of America meant a profit of around fifteen to twenty million dollars a year.

We need socialization of aluminum, because we need, among other things, aluminum. We need it cheap and we need it in immense quantities, not only for raliway transport but for better, stronger, and lighter automobiles; for cheaper airplanes; for long bridges; for electrical transmission; for the construction industry; and, last but not least, for cheap, durable kitchen utensils.

What is the sense of our having a splendid industrial struc

Co. do so? Far from it.

Twice in the past 2 years aluminum workers have been obliged to strike and form picket lines to gain their right to collective bargaining. And despite two strikes, they still lack an agreement with the Mellon corporation. Their second strike lasted a month, with the Mellon corporation. Their second strike lasted a month, and was settled by that most effective of all strikebreakers—hunger. The men and women who make aluminum were forced back into the plants under a verbal understanding in which the Aluminum Co. recognized the principle of collective bargaining—magnanimous concession—but refused to sign an agreement on wages. With many other hard-boiled American corporations, Aluminum understands collective bargaining to consist of a formal meeting with a workers' committee in which the company officials suavely but firmly refuse to bargain. Now we find this corporation, by underhanded methods, stirring up dissention in the ranks of the aluminum workers through a disguised company union. tion, by underhanded methods, stirring up dissention in the ranks of the aluminum workers through a disguised company union.

There was no little embarrassment, not only in the Pittsburgh headquarters of the Aluminum Co., but also in the sacred precincts of the National Recovery Administration in Washington, when the National Industrial Recovery Act stipulated that all industries must submit codes of fair competition. How was this perfect 100-percent monopoly going to submit a code of fair competition when all its activities since its organization in the 1880's have been directed against fair competition? With the aid of the most expensive law firm in Pittsburgh, Mr. Mellon's bright and shining lightweight metal corporation submitted a lightweight code to Washington. It was that marvel of marvels, a code of fair competition which omitted any reference to fair competition. It concerned itself only with wages and hours, and what wages! Mr. Mellon's company, rich, powerful, and arrogant, proposed in its code to pay the munificent minimum wage of 25 cents an hour, or $10 a week. Why is it, I wonder, that the more monopolistic these outfits are, the nearer they come to paying starvation wages? paying starvation wages?

Aluminum was obliged to up the ante to 30 cents for its southern workers and to 35 to 37½ cents for its northern workers.

The independent firms in the field, those which fabricate the aluminum after the monopoly makes the raw metal, insisted on clauses in the code guaranteeing to them the same price that the clauses in the code guaranteeing to them the same price that the monopoly charges for the raw metal to its own subsidiaries in the fabricating business. General Johnson found the aluminum code too hot to handle for 10 months, and it gained the reputation as the most embalmed of all the embalmed codes lying in cold storage in the N. R. A. vaults. Finally it was approved, suddenly and secretly, by General Johnson. Needless to say, the code was perfectly satisfactory to Mr. Mellon's company.

What has been the advantage to American consumers of aluminum and American employees in the aluminum industry from the tight-fisted control of this great firm by Mr. Mellon? On the one hand, the company has pioneered in the development of a new metal—naturally so, for its own interests. Beyond that the credit side of the ledger ends and we turn to the debits.

Foremost has been the restriction of production deliberately followed by the Mellon corporation since its beginning. America has been deliberately starved in the supply of aluminum in order that Mr. Mellon could fix that fine point of production at which the highest profitable price would be realized. His firm has deliberately smothered competition, not once but continuously. Whenever another firm threatened to enter the field, he bludgeoned it back into nothingness, either by force majeure or by assimilation. The American people have never had the chance to buy aluminum at a competitive price. More serious, those vast economies in production which would have been spurred by sharp competition, by lowered price, by the development of new methods and the hastening of research into new basic improvements, have been throttled. The price of aluminum today is about the same as it was 30 years ago, despite tremendous strides made in speeding up workers, and in introducing improved machinery. However, there has been no fundamental advance in the manufacture of aluminum through new processes—such an advance might scrap the Aluminum Co.'s investment in its present equipment, and therefore must be fought until such time as the company consents to embrace such new methods.

This conscious sabotage of production is by far the most serious indictment we can bring against our great industrial conversions.

This conscious sabotage of production is by far the most serious indictment we can bring against our great industrial corporations, controlled as they are by profit-minded bankers. It is a deliberate policy of fostering want.

Not only does the public suffer but the men and women who depend on aluminum for their livelihood are condemned to a bare, cold existence. It is not generally known that Mr. Mellon's aluminum company clung to the 12-hour shift right up to 1929, long after the notoriously hard-boiled steel industry had seen that the 12-hour day was frightfully inefficient and costly. Within a year, 2 years after Aluminum abandoned the 12-hour shift, its workers considered themselves lucky to work 2 or 3 days a week. The anarchy of production takes a senseless toll of the lives of those workers, working them inhumanly long hours, then condemning them to unemployment and partial employment.

The only people in this country who do not suffer from this conscious disorder in production are the stock and bond holders of Aluminum Co.

of Aluminum Co.

of Aluminum Co.

I leave to learned gentlemen the discussion of details or socialization. They will argue wisely on how much Mr. Mellon and his cronies ought to be paid by the public for their sabotage of aluminum production for the past 50 years. For my part I would pay them nothing. They owe the American people hundreds of millions of dollars for their antisocial management of this great industry. If we are to pay Aluminum's stockholders when we socialize this industry, what about the claims of some 20,000 aluminum workers who, through no fault of their own, have lost during the past 4 years perhaps as much as $100,000,000 in lost wages because of total or part-time unemployment?

I know it will be urged that Mr. Mellon has already accumulated a small army of widows and orphans dependent on aluminum stock for their livelihood. I would humbly suggest that the widows and orphans be pensioned by the United States Government for services rendered in holding Aluminum stock, and that they be pensioned under Mr. Roosevelt's social security law, soon to be passed by Congress. I know that it will be objected that this is unconstitutional—that such forms of cruel and unusual punishment are stitutional—that such forms of cruel and unusual punishment are

stitutional—that such forms of cruel and unusual punishment are forbidden.

In the last war the great patriots at the head of the Aluminum Corporation charged the Government 50 cents a pound for aluminum for its manifold war purposes. When we had been in the World War a year the Aluminum Co. was finally persuaded to charge only 33 cents a pound. Nevertheless, Comptroller General McCarl in recent years has been obliged to hold up payments to the Aluminum Co. on Navy work because the aluminum patriots insisted on charging 38 cents a pound after they had agreed on 33 cents. The case is now in the courts.

Right now you have the farce being enacted periodically down in the Navy Department, where officials take bids for aluminum needed on destroyers, cruisers, and other naval vessels, out of a hat. The bids are all identical, and the hocus-pocus of going through the motions of asking for them is sheer waste of time.

For my part, I am not interested in the billion-dollar war programs of the Roosevelt administration. My plea for socialization of aluminum is a plea for more goods, for more services, for higher, not lower, standards of living. My plea for socialization is based on the premise that to continue as we are means continuing impoverishment of the American people, relieved only by the ghastly prospect of another world war made inevitable by the operation of a system of production for private profit rather than for use. The plea for the socialization of our basic industries is a plea for the emergence of a higher and better form of civilization.

SOCIALIZATION OF THE STEEL INDUSTRY-ADDRESS BY HORACE B. DAVIS

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Congressional Record a radio address on the Socialization of the Steel Industry, delivered on February 9, 1935, by Horace B. Davis, author of Labor and Steel.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The steel industry was among the first in this country to apply on a large scale the policy of trying to create prosperity by creating scarcity. The Roosevelt administration, being a business administration, has now applied the same policy on a larger scale than ever. It has not only prevented goods from being produced—it has actually destroyed them after they were produced. It has set about to create scarcity as a means to creating prosperity.

We are now able to appreciate the policy in its true light. We have the scarcity, but not the prosperity.

It is doubtful whether even the rather uncertain degree of prosperity which this country enjoyed from 1922 to 1929 can ever be reestablished under capitalism. But the steel companies at any rate have done nothing to end the depression. While in other industries prices were being reduced in the depression, steel prices stayed up. The steel barons were following their old policy of creating artificial scarcity. As early as 1932 Dr. R. R. Doane showed that the prices of steel, electric power, paint, and cement (the latter a commodity controlled largely by steel companies) had dropped only 15 to 25 percent from the 1929 level, although the prices of other raw materials had dropped an average of 35 percent.

Dr. Doane pointed out that it would be difficult for new construction to be resumed on the previous scale as long as the raw materials of heavy construction remained relatively expensive.

struction to be resumed on the previous scale as long as the raw materials of heavy construction remained relatively expensive. A recent Government report shows that what was true in 1932 continued true through 1934. The report concluded that the steel companies preferred small production at high prices to lower prices and a somewhat larger production. Many economists are now saying that the continued depression in the capital-goods industries is preventing the end of the depression. These economists are invited to examine the price policies of the capital-goods-producing industries, especially of steel. Perhaps then they will understand why the number of unemployed still hangs around the 17,000,000 mark will understand why the number of unemployed still hangs around the 17,000,000 mark.

There are some who think that wars could be prevented, labor could be protected, and steel could be produced and sold more cheaply than at present if we would merely vote to socialize the steel industry. My friends, this is a utopian idea. The schemes for saving the country which have been issuing from Washington at the rate of about two a week ever since March 1933, and most of which parade under the name of economic planning, are based on a misconception. They think they can perform a monkey-gland operation and make over capitalism, which is old and senile into a young progressive system. They do not take based on a misconception. They think they can perform a monkey-gland operation and make over capitalism, which is old and senile, into a young, progressive system. They do not take into account the class forces in the United States. They do not consider who it is that runs the steel industry, and why.

The basic industries of the United States will not be socialized one by one. It is quite conceivable that the railroads and the public utilities and even some natural resources might be nationalized, as they have been in other countries. But such nationalization is a long way from genuine socialization. The conditions of the workers are not much different, nor are the consumers very much better off. And in any case, it has always happened heretofore that at a certain point privilege has made a stand and has refused to yield to the results of the democratic process. Then, either the revolutionary working class and its allies press forward, take the power, and socialize all the basic industries at once, as happened in Russia; or the working class hesitates, its muscles palsied by legalistic scruples. This kind of hesitation is the direct consequence of social-democratic illusions. It is absolutely fatal to genuine socialization. The working-class advance loses momentum. It turns into a retreat and finally gives way before the onslaught of organized reaction.

In the ensuing rout many hundreds or thousands of the best leaders of labour transpared. This keep the second of the pest transpared of the before the onslaught of organized reaction.

In the ensuing rout many hundreds or thousands of the best leaders of labor are murdered or imprisoned. This has been the unfortunate history of Italy, Germany, Austria, and Spain.

Just because steel is a key industry, just because it has exploited its labor so brutally and piled up such enormous profits, just because it is the industry of all others that you and I would like to see socialized, it will be socialized only after a real struggle. The big financiers will break a lance or two before they consent to see steel taken out of their private control. The benefits of socialization and of planned economy can only be realized under genuine socialism, after the basis of the profit system has been destroyed. Thus it is only in Russia that the steel workers know no unemployment and no exploitation, because only in Russia have the foundations of a genuinely Socialist society been laid. For such a society, a basic requisite is a workers' government.

WORK FOR THE UNEMPLOYED-LETTER FROM SENATOR SCHALL TO THE PRESIDENT

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter written by me to the President of the United States on the 3d of December 1934.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DECEMBER 3, 1934.

The Honorable Franklin D. Roosevelt, President of the United States,

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: For the purpose of furnishing a working example by which a majority of the 10,000,000 persons now unemployed may be returned to profitable employment, without taking one dollar from the United States Treasury, the following list is a rough draft of how those people can be cared for within 6 months.

By acting as England, Canada, Australia, Norway, and Sweden have done, that is by stopping imports which compete with what we produce, we find we must reemploy the following:

Two million persons to cultivate cane- and beet-sugar lands, if foreign sugar is excluded.

Two million persons to cultivate new corn land when blackstrap molasses is barred.

Three hundred thousand miners to operate our copper mines. Two hundred and twenty-five thousand additional pottery and

One hundred and seventy-five thousand to make carpet, rag, and grass rugs.

One hundred and fifty thousand fishermen and canners when these imports are stopped.

One hundred and fifty thousand iron and steel workers.

One hundred thousand persons to raise cattle now imported as

One hundred thousand silver miners, if we buy our own silver. One hundred thousand to produce gunny cloth and gunny sacks now imported.

One hundred thousand shoe workers. Seventy-five thousand textile workers

Fifty-thousand persons in electric lamp, toy, and novelty factories.

Fifty thousand persons to can meats.

Fifty thousand to produce cement and bricks.

Fifty thousand manganese miners.

Thirty thousand vegetable canning workers.

Twenty-five thousand additional coal miners.

Fifty thousand distillery and wine workers.

All these people at this moment are on Government relief.

With the power vested in you by the last Congress, Mr. President, you can raise the tariffs on all these articles and thereby return about 6.000,000 persons to profitable employment. It is reasonable you can raise the tarills on all these articles and thereby return about 6,000,000 persons to profitable employment. It is reasonable to assume that this number of persons will employ another 3,000,000 to supply their wants. After that, Mr. President, we have no unemployment problem and no depression. I trust this matter will be given your earnest consideration.

With best wishes, cordially yours,

THOS. D. SCHALL

GOV. GEN. FRANK MURPHY-ARTICLE IN MANILA (P. I.) TRIBUNE

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Congressional Record an article appearing in the Manila (P. I.) Tribune of January 22, 1935, relative to the administration of Governor General Frank

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Manila (P. I.) Tribune, Jan. 22, 1935]

STABILITY IS FRANK MURPHY'S CONTRIBUTION—SOUND FISCAL POLICY IS STIMULANT TO SOCIAL CONSCIOUSNESS—GOOD WILL MARKS AD-

The departure for the United States tomorrow of Gov. Frank Murphy marks the close of one chapter in what may be called "the transition before the transition period" in Philippine Government, and in a broader sense, in the entire social structure of the Philippines

The interruption in Murphy's administration occasioned by his

The interruption in Murphy's administration occasioned by his visit to the United States being temporary, as the Governor General has repeatedly stated, the development of this pretransition in the Philippines will not be affected. But even if events so form themselves as to prevent Mr. Murphy's return to the Philippines, that development, proceeding under the impetus given it by the concerted effort in carrying out his policies, will continue so that when the country enters its next stage, that of the Commonwealth, it will do so under the brightest auspices.

Frank Murphy's achievements in the 19 months which have elapsed since he outlined his policies in his inaugural address on the Luneta on June 15, 1933, must be considered not only as a fruition of those policies in themselves, but in relation to the extent to which they have been carried out by his associates in the government, the willingness with which they were so carried out, and, perhaps most important of all, the readiness with which they were accepted by the people. Taken together these three factors constitute a safe gage of the soundness of those policies, and therefore of the success of the Murphy administration.

DEVOTES LABORS TO ESTABLISHMENT OF FINANCIAL STABILITY IN GOV-ERNMENT

Frank Murphy's goal, from the day he assumed his office here, has been stability. He saw clearly that in preparation for ultimate independence the country's greatest need lay in the assurace of stability in every phase of government—first of all, financial stability, the rock on which the entire structure rests. It was to this that he devoted a great part of his time and effort—to the establishment of a Gibraltarlike fastness in government finance—and his insistence on this point has had far-reaching effects; for not only in the entitles of government concerned nursely with not only in the entities of government concerned purely with financial questions, but in all other departments, a new zeal, a new ardor has developed; a spirit which, fostered by his insistence, equally strong, on the prime duties of government to the people, has radiated among the people.

Murphy's insistence on financial stability has brought as its outstanding concrete result the effect that in the 6 months of 1933 from June 15, and in the year 1934, the Philippine government has spent less than it has taken in the form of revenue. The period being in the midst of the world depression, this feat has not been duplicated, not only by any government in the world but by many private firms in industry and business.

While in the decade just passed there has been a degree of solvency in the Philippine Government, stability in a sense has been lacking. Thus, in 1925 there was a surplus of some P9,000,000. In the following year, in 1926, there was a deficit of P12,000,000. Economies and high collections in the succeeding years, particularly in the 3 years preceding Frank Murphy's administration, reduced this shortage. In the first 6 months under Murphy, June 15 to December 31, 1933, a saving of P1,600,000 was made in the operation of the government.

UNEXPECTED SURPLUS AT CLOSE OF 1934 REACHES 14,000,000 PESOS, WITH A NET SAVING OF 6,000,000 PESOS

A NET SAVING OF 6,000,000 PESOS

On December 31, 1934, a year later, the Philippine government had an unexpended surplus of nearly F14,000,000, of which between six and seven millions is a net saving. The rest is in funds appropriated, but not expended, and there is a likelihood of considerable saving in this respect when the funds are released.

The likelihood of such further savings is increased by the fact that all activities for 1935 are on a program basis. With the principle of living within the income as the supreme policy of the Murphy administration, and the expenditures closely budgeted, sufficient care will have been taken to prevent any outlay beyond those programed for a specific period, and the task of keeping the Government out of the red simplified.

Murphy's specific achievements toward insuring financial stability were the economies he ordered or caused to be brought about, the constant stressing of the necessity for systematic tax collections, his insistence on budgets which must not exceed actual income collected, and his dictum that all public works expenditures must be on the basis of merit. Among his first public pronouncements was that of July 8, 1933, scarcely a month after he took office, urging a sound and conservative banking policy.

DEFICITS OF PREVIOUS YEARS SWALLOWED UP BY ECONOMIES, STRICT SUPERVISION

He set his face determinedly against any form of tax condonation, and he fixed a definite policy of no overdrafts, no filling of vacancies, no new expenditures. The net result of this is shown in the figures for the 3 years preceding his administration. In 1930, 1931, and 1932 expenditures exceeded income by some $\frac{p}{2}0,000,000$. In 1932 the deficit, greatly reduced, was still $\frac{p}{4},000,000$. At the end of 1933 the insular government had a cash surplus of $\frac{p}{5}00,000$.

In provincial finance he caused to be set up a system of monthly survey reports which resulted in the elimination of overdrafts and, in provinces, the establishment of surpluses.

Throughout the government departments the plan of the 5-percent reserve on all appropriation has worked to eliminate deficits cent reserve on all appropriation has worked to eliminate deficits and has done its share towards establishing stability. And coupled with these were the installation of businesslike methods throughout the entire service, the formation and functioning of economic and efficiency committees, as well as frequent surprise inspections.

STABILITY IDEA TAKEN UP BY PEOPLE

Once established as the guiding policy of the financial structure of the government, this notion of stability soon began to filter through other departments until it permeated not only the government services but found its way into the spirit of the people. Everywhere there is noticeable a desire to straighten things out, to organize affairs; everywhere a striving for strong, stable establishment of things in preparation for the sterner tasks which will come with the formation of the new government, a formation to which the present is in its way a transition.

Stable methods, based on constitutionally prescribed processes, a the present is in its way a transition.

Stable methods, based on constitutionally prescribed processes, a stability in procedure, these have noticeably been taking the place of a spirit which had aimed for novelty, for a different way of doing things. Murphy's legal training is, of course, largely responsible for this outlook of his, which envisages things in the light of orderly procedure. With the unstinted cooperation which he has been able to secure in the government, he has succeeded in encouraging a greater turning to the orderliness and stability of constitutional methods in all activities of the government. A spirit, sane and conservative, has thus been created.

INFLUENCE NOTED IN SOCIAL PROBLEMS

In the field of social problems Frank Murphy's influence is particularly noted. It has been held that a social program cannot easily go hand in hand with a well-planned program of government. But Murphy has demonstrated that together with a sound economy in government expenditures, the solution, or at least amelioration of social problems, can well be achieved. The result has been that together with a financially sound government, the Philippines today has the first planned and effective social program in its history. The eradication of slum districts, increased activities in the field of public health, family in particular and social relief in general, the improvement of housing, the reorganization of the hospital service, all these have been initiated in such a way as to insure their proper working out. way as to insure their proper working out.

But all these have been strictly governmental activities, or activities in large part fostered by the government. What is more important in this connection is the fact that in the last 19 months there has been noted a new and wide-spread consciousness of the nature of social problems, a popular sensitiveness to them, and a recognition of the fact that their solution is not solely a task for government but one in which all the people must share. This in itself is a distinct contribution of Frank Murphy's to the strengthening of a national social spirit in the Philippines, one which will go a long way toward solidifying and unifying the people as a

ESTABLISHES ERA OF GOOD WILL

Other Governors General have had the willing cooperation of the Filipino participation in the government, but it remained for Frank Murphy, perhaps fittingly, for he is to be the last of the American chief executives in the islands, to have brought about what may well be termed an era of good will here.

He began by demonstrating that he would play honest, above-board politics, recognizing the importance of the political factor, by announcing, a few months after he came here, that he would consult the party leaders before making appointments. Nevertheless, he maintained the principle of merit first, with the result that his appointments have been universally praised, and his government proceeded without friction.

His administration in general has been marked with consideration and tact, two factors which won for him not only the cooperation but the confidence of the leaders in the Filipino participation. The relationship between them has been on the highest plane, since the confidence so generously accorded was proved justified by the fact that all soon came to recognize that Frank Murphy would not bargain, would not make trades, but would proceed in the light of principle and on the basis of securing the best service. Perhaps in no other way was that cooperation and confidence so well demonstrated as in the faintness of the protest against his veto of appropriations totaling nearly twenty-six millions. This act of his received the general support of the legislative leaders. of the legislative leaders.

FINANCIAL STABILITY IS FIRST STEP

FINANCIAL STABILITY IS FIRST STEP

Frank Murphy came to the Philippines imbued with the notion of doing his job. His major premise was that the happiness and health of the individual and the actual political freedom of the people are the first and most important objectives of government. As the first step toward these objectives he bent his efforts to establish financial stability, which would set the government free for their attainment. By a strict adherence to principle and by tactful and considerate exercise of his powers, which embraced the recognition of the powers and privileges, as well as obligations, of his associates in the government, he has secured this stability, and effected its spread into other departments of the service and its permeation of all social strata. His policies, and, above all, his winning to those policies of the support and backing of the leaders in the government, has brought about a revitalization of the national social consciousness, and has created a situation which, his severest critics will not be able to deny, is conducive to the successful accomplishment of the task that now faces the Filipinos as a nation. Filipinos as a nation.

By these things the work of Frank Murphy in the Philippines

OPINIONS OF SUPREME COURT IN GOLD CLAUSE CASES-ARTICLE BY FRANK R. KENT

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Congressional Record an article which has just appeared in the Baltimore Sun, by Frank R. Kent, referring to the recent decision of the Supreme Court, entitled "Victory Not Vindication."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

> [From the Baltimore Sun of Feb. 20, 1935] VICTORY NOT VINDICATION

There is a vast difference between victory and vindication. The day following the Supreme Court decision in the gold cases the newspapers flamed with big headlines such as "Court Sustains the Government", "Administration Backed", "The New Deal Wins."

newspapers named with big headlines such as "Court Sustains the Government", "Administration Backed", "The New Deal Wins."

And so it did win in the material sense. Where it lost was on the moral end. What it lost was its reputation. The new deal was victorious—but it was not vindicated. Now that there has been time for the sense of the decision to sink in, this at least is clear. Whatever impression the general public may have derived from the headlines, the commentators, and the propagandists, no thoughtful man puts any other interpretation upon it. It is not possible to put any other interpretation upon what the majority opinion plainly says. And no matter how great the relief he may experience, no member of the administration above the lower grade of politician feels any pride in the "victory." On the contrary, those of more sensitive natures and higher intelligence are not unashamed of the position in which they are left.

In brief, it is not an opinion upon which the "new dealers" care to dwell. They gladly accept the material victory, but they would rather not stress the moral aspects of the decision. Pleased they may be at having escaped a tremendous reverse, but they wear no badge of honor awarded by the Supreme Court. Quite the contrary. They have a natural reaction from the fear which has gripped them these past few weeks—but the word "relief" rather than "pride" accurately describes their emotion—from the White House down.

Because the undeniable truth is that not only a majority of the

Because the undeniable truth is that not only a majority of the Because the undeniable truth is that not only a majority of the Court but a united Court agreed that the administration had broken the Government's pledged word, repudiated its obligation, disregarded the Constitution, and exceeded its rights when it nullified the gold clause in the Government's own bonds. It had the right to abrogate private contracts through change in monetary policy, but not the right to violate its own contract, which it did.

The decision—the majority decision, not the minority—says these things in plain language. There can be no mistaking their meaning. That, after having taken this unequivocal stand as a unit, five members of the Court, constituting a majority, should then veer around and rule that the Government cannot be compelled to meet its obligations to pay in gold because of various relatively minor reasons, including the fact that the appealing bondholder could show no damage, seems unreasonable and strained.

And so it is unless the "possible consequences" of a thoroughly logical, consistent, and outspoken opinion are considered. These were very great indeed. They might have been actually disastrous, both economically and politically to the Nation as a whole. It is easy to understand that these "possible consequences" entered into the majority opinion in this case, just as they undoubtedly influenced the majority opinion of the Court some 15 years ago in the famous Adamson law case. In brief, the Court, in this instance, as in that, took into consideration the national welfare as well as the law as well as the law.

It brands as invalid a Government act, but refuses to annul it because of the possible consequences. Upon no other ground does it seem possible to explain logically the majority verdict. It leaves Mr. Roosevelt in the position of being told that he has done a wrong as well as illegal thing. He has stained the Nation's honor, but the stain cannot be wiped out without dangerously impairing the national welfare. Thus, the new deal, with no certificate of character, is enabled to proceed on its course, deprived now of the alibi for failure that the Supreme Court stood in the way. It is easy to understand how Mr. Roosevelt can feel in the way. It is easy to understand how Mr. Roosevelt can feel relieved at this decision but hardly "gratified."

OPINIONS OF THE SUPREME COURT IN THE GOLD CLAUSE CASES

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, allow me to say to the Chairman of the Appropriations Committee that I regret the necessity to speak briefly on a matter not now directly before the Senate. I realize the pressure on the chairman of the committee, but the subject I am about to discuss is one that I regard as highly important.

Mr. President, a few days ago the Supreme Court of the United States rendered a decision which is an outstanding one not only in the legal history of America but, as affecting economic policy and currency and money control, it will become important perhaps to a greater extent than any similar decision in the history of the Republic.

Senators will recall that over a period of practically 2 years the questions of currency and money have been of commanding importance in the United States and that, as a result of policies of the Congress, there was adopted what was known as the devaluation of the gold dollar.

That result was not accomplished alone by a single piece of legislation; but through a process of enactment from time to time, all in harmony with one single plan, there was brought about a devaluation of the gold dollar, the calling into the Treasury of all gold coin and gold certificates, amounting to the establishment by the Government of a new system of money and currency control.

The decision of the Supreme Court was a fine and, I may say, distinguished confirmation of the power of the Congress, almost without limit, over the standard of money, the control of the currency, with the incidental power to do all things necessary to accomplish these purposes. The Supreme Court in rendering that decision rose to the very heights of its dignity. I am happy to know that the decision was not a partisan decision, that it was not a political decision, but that the members of the Court divided upon lines which were not characterized by their predilections or their former political alinement. Attorney General Cummings and others who appeared for the Government are entitled to high praise for the splendid manner in which the interests of the Government were presented and protected. With ability and tireless research the Department of Justice and other legal representatives of the Government not only aided in preparing the legislation but in maintaining it.

Mr. President, as a result of the decision it cannot be said that it is unnecessary for the Government to go one step further and to end whatever uncertainty or whatever feeling of uneasiness may arise from that particular feature of the Court's opinion which held that, though the Congress did not possess the power to strike out of the Government's obligations the gold clause, still by reason of other acts of the Congress and the Government the holder of the obligation in effect had no present recourse.

I suggest to the Senate and those who are charged with responsibility with respect to the policies of the Government that we ought speedily to determine upon some policy which will meet whatever contingencies might arise in order to give entire effect and complete certainty of decision with reference to the currency and money questions of the United States

Mr. President, the press of this morning carries a statement from former President Hoover in which he urges that the United States restore the gold basis, as he terms it, and return to the old policy of issuing coined gold and delivering it in exchange for currency to those who demand gold payment. The former President seems to imply in his statement that the present policy of the Government has introduced a certain degree of uncertainty in the possible future policy of the Government.

I contend that the Government is now on a gold basis under the legislation of the Congress. It is true that the government has called the gold coin into the Treasury and no longer issues it in the form of coined dollars, but the gold in the Treasury is just as much a reserve to maintain the value of the currency, and probably more so, than if it were in the form of coined dollars paid out over the counter. It was to avoid the possibility of corners in gold, it was to avoid the possibility of runs on the gold reserves of the Nation by those who might demand gold payments, thereby depleting the gold reserves and thereby putting the country not upon a gold standard, but upon a paper standard without sufficient gold reserve, that the present policy of the Government was adopted. The measure of standard today under this legislation is just as much the gold dollar of fifteen and a fraction grains as though those coined dollars were exchanged across the counter from time to time. So I challenge the attack of former President Hoover that America is not today upon a gold-standard basis.

Mr. President, what measures the Government ought to adopt in order to settle or extinguish whatever possible claims holders of obligations might in the future have on the ground that they have suffered damage by reason of the policy of the Government, I am not prepared at the moment to suggest except to say that the result may be accomplished in one of two or possibly three ways, either, as was suggested by one of the justices of the Supreme Court, by modifying the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims-which frankly I would prefer we should not adopt if other adequate means may be adopted; through the process of taxation of possible profits accruing through the enhancement of gold bullion, or probably some related process; but whatever the determination may be it ought to be speedily enacted and speedily enforced in order to remove any uncertainty whatever.

Mr. President, so far as the gold standard and gold value are concerned I, as one who has been intensely interested in the method of devaluing the dollar from the beginning, do not regard the Supreme Court decision as forecasting that the policy of the Congress in the future may be to adopt some method of wild paper inflation. It is true that under this decision almost transcendent authority is demonstrated to exist in the Congress regarding what shall be money and the regulation of the standard of money.

As I suggested in this Chamber 2 years ago in a speech—and it is still the truth—when, under the Constitution, Congress was endowed with the power to regulate the value of money and to declare control of the currency, that power was vested in the Congress to be exercised by it under its high responsibility, under its conceptions of patriotism, under its desire to serve the public welfare, and that it would exercise that power in wisdom and in justice and in fairness to the great body of the American people. Under that standard there will never be invited any process of wild inflation by the printing-press process. I desire to say here and now, Mr. President, that I have never been nor am I now in favor of that sort of inflation.

The Senator from Virginia [Mr. Glass], I dare say, will bear me witness that from the very beginning of the discussion of this question the junior Senator from Texas has not advocated that kind of inflation. One of the reasons why I have favored the devaluation of the gold dollar was to avoid evil of inflation through the printing press of great volumes of unsecured and irredeemable paper money.

One of the compelling motives for devaluation, at least in my own heart, was my belief that the dollar ought to be reduced in value, but that the revalued dollar should be a sound dollar, a dollar of fixed value, a value based upon a standard measurement of gold. Mr. President, under the policies of this Congress and of this administration, fortified and strengthened by the decision of the highest Court in the land, that is exactly what we have today. Instead of having a gold dollar of one value and a paper dollar of a depreciated value, the currency of America today is upon an equal basis. Every dollar is worth the same as every other dollar because of the fact that the Government itself is the custodian of the gold reserves, making it impossible to raid the Treasury, making it impossible to bring about a corner on gold. That Government custody is a guaranty that every dollar sanctioned by the Government shall have the same value, whether in the hands of a private individual or in the vaults of the Treasury itself.

Mr. President, I regard it as most unfortunate that Mr. Hoover should seek this particular moment—when the country and the world, for that matter, are congratulating the Congress of the United States on its policy and the Supreme Court for its great decision—to sound a note of dissent, to sound a complaint as to the financial policies of the Government.

Senators will recall that in the closing days of the Hoover administration Senators were summoned to the White House late at night, with great secrecy, and were warned that the United States, without its own consent, was about to be forced off the gold standard. All the possible horrors, all the dire consequences of that action were related to Senators. Why? Because Mr. Hoover was unable, by the exercise of the powers vested in his administration, to avert the terrors of which he stood so much in dread. He now says he wants "to restore confidence in the dollar." He proposes now to revive the same old system which brought financial disaster to America and which brought his own administration tumbling in ruins about his ears. He now wants to go back to the same old system whereby speculators in foreign exchange, whereby the international bankers, whereby hoarders of gold may make their raids upon Treasury and upon the reserve stocks of the Reserve banks in America. Mr. President, this complaint would seem to be founded upon the pique and disappointment of Mr. Hoover rather than upon any sound economic or constitutional basis.

Mr. Hoover undertakes to point out five reasons why a return to that system is desirable.

He says, first, that a return to the old system of paying out gold—

Would put more men to work out of the 12,000,000 who still remain unemployed than any other single action.

How that is to be done Mr. Hoover fails to tell us. We had that system while he was President. Under that system he was then unable to provide employment. He was then unable to deplete the ranks of the idle; but from month to month and from day to day the recruiting officers of despair added to the swelling ranks of the army of the idle. Yet Mr. Hoover now offers a return to that system as the instrumentality whereby unemployment will be removed. He offers that as a remedy for the very condition which we are seeking to remedy through the pending joint resolution. I deny it, Mr. President.

Second. Mr. Hoover says that-

The Government's program of stimulating the capital goods and giving employment through public works can never result in 25 percent of the jobs which can be provided by recovery of normal private capital-goods activities.

That is a platitude which nobody will deny; but how will a return to the old system of a costly, expensive dollar, a $1.69 dollar, as against the new devalued dollar, accomplish that? I believe, Mr. President, that when the future historian comes to write the moving chapters of the tragic period through which we have been passing he may note that the outstanding element in the recovery we are now approaching has been the fact that we had the courage and the administration had the wisdom to devalue the gold dollar, and put us in a position whereby we might lift commodity prices, and discharge in a just and equitable dollar something of the vast load of debts and bonds hanging over us.

Former President Hoover intimates that the devaluation which has already taken place has increased the cost of living. If that be true, it means that those who toil and those who manufacture articles are receiving more employment. It means that they are receiving more for their labor. It means that the factories which are dependent upon profits for their operation are busier now and are making more upon their output.

Mr. President, I make these statements through no spirit of partisanship. I regard the policy of the Government with reference to the devaluation of the dollar as already fixed and determined. I am anxious, however, that the Government shall take such other steps as may be wise or desirable to remove whatever doubt or uncertainty may exist with regard to the holders of Government gold obligations; but I deplore the attack of former President Hoover, who now seems by some occult process, at least in his own mind, to have acquired a knowledge of economics and a conception of public policy which he was never able to demonstrate while he was in power, and which perhaps he is hopeful he may have another opportunity of demonstrating in the years to come.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma and Mr. AUSTIN addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield first to the Senator from Oklahoma. Then I shall yield to the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Texas has been discussing the monetary policies and record made by the administration now in power. I desire to remind the Senator and state to the Senate that it was the distinguished Senator from Texas who first suggested in this body the necessity of reducing the gold content of the dollar. I remember very well the day he made that speech, standing in the rear of the Chamber, and I well remember the sort of smile that flitted over the faces of gentlemen who are not now here at the idea that any Senator should even dare to suggest that the sacred gold dollar be reduced a single atom in its weight.

The distinguished Senator from Texas has also alluded to another point to which I desire to refer, if he will permit me to do so.

Mr. CONNALLY. I shall be glad to have the Senator do so. After what he has already said, he may consume all the time he desires. [Laughter.]

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I am glad to give credit where credit is due.

The Senator from Texas suggested that the opinion of the Supreme Court apparently denied the holders of Federal securities an opportunity to recover the value of the old gold dollar; that their only recourse is to accept the legal-tender money in circulation at the time their obligations become due. If I remember correctly, the Senator suggested that under the terms of that decision the holders of Liberty bonds perhaps might go to the Court of Claims and file actions for damages in the Court of Claims against the United States, claiming that they gave up more value when they bought their Liberty bonds than they received when they cashed them.

Here is my question: Is it not a fact that if all the courts of the Nation were denied jurisdiction to consider the complaints of holders of Federal obligations, even so the holders of those obligations, if they feel that they have been injured and have suffered loss, can always come to the Congress and file claims in the Congress? If that is done the claims will go before the proper committee; there they will be considered; and if the holders of the obligations have just claims against the Government, the Congress of the United States, I hope, always will be available and willing to consider such claims as may be shown to be valid.

The question is: If the courts should be denied jurisdiction to consider the claims of those who think they have suffered loss, will they not still have the Congress as a court into which they can go and submit any claims they may have?

Mr. CONNALLY. Of course. Let me say to the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma that what the Senator from Texas meant to suggest was that so long as there is any uncertainty as to not the right but the privilege, I may say, of bondholders to resort to the Court of Claims or any other court on the theory that they have suffered damage by reason of surrendering a bond calling for the old gold dollar and having to accept in lieu thereof new currency, the more speedily that doubt can be removed the more will be contributed to the stability of the currency system, and the more encouragement will be given to business. Of course, Congress is always here. It is always here to do what the Senator from Oklahoma suggested a moment ago.

Any citizen who may have any kind of a claim is always entitled at least to a hearing before the Congress. He may not always have his claim extinguished, he may not always be paid in the amount to which he feels entitled, but, like all other powers of the Congress, that power is vested here, on the theory, at least, if not always in practice, that Congress, representing the people, deriving its powers from the people, shall legislate for them in wisdom and in justice, and under its high conceptions of patriotism and duty.

There is no other place where we can put the power. All of our agencies here are human; there are no demigods except in their own imaginations, and wherever the power rests we have to trust to some human agency to be fair, to be just, and to sit in the seat of power with a sense of responsibility and a desire to act righteously. Does that answer the Senator?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Yes; I thank the Senator. Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, did I understand the Senator from Texas to say there are no demagogues?

Mr. CONNALLY. No; I said "no demigods."

Mr. GLASS. Oh! [Laughter.]

Mr. CONNALLY. I said there were no demigods. I have a suspicion that the Senator from Virginia understood me all the time. [Laughter.] I cannot believe that he was concerned as to the difference between demigods and demagogues at this particular stage of our deliberation and discussion. But for the enlightenment and for the further information of the Senator from Virginia, I said that there were no demigods, except in their own imaginations.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me? Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. AUSTIN. I ask the Senator from Texas whether he will not permit the article about which he is commenting, and which he is criticizing very severely, to be inserted in the Record at the conclusion of his remarks? If so, I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the Record following the remarks of the Senator from Texas.

Mr. CONNALLY. I have no objection to Mr. Hoover's statement going into the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Vermont? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

(See exhibit A.)

Mr. CONNALLY. I desire to thank the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma for his generous reference to the speech of the Senator from Texas made in this Chamber on January 24, 1933, in which he first urged reduction of the gold content of the dollar. I desire to call attention, in that connection, in order to fortify what the Senator said, to the fact that I introduced a bill in this body on the 13th day of March 1933, a few days after the beginning of the present administration, in which it was provided that all gold should be called into the Treasury, and that thereafter no gold coin should be emitted. Section 1 of the bill provided that all debts, public and private, contracted after April 7, 1917, should be payable in lawful money of the United States, and carrying a number of other provisions similar to those which have been before the Senate from time to time.

Mr. President, I regard the policy adopted by the Government and now pursued with relation to money as having for the first time in the history of the Republic made absolutely clear the power of the Congress, with relation to currency, to control money and its value, and the general financial policy of the Federal Government; and that is something accomplished. The way is now charted; it is indicated just how far and by what processes the road shall be traveled. The monetary question always has heretofore been a disturbing one, and some of the campaigns of the past have been waged very largely on the question of the power of Congress to control money and currency.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, during the remarks just made by the Senator from Texas he made the assertion, not as boldly as I think it should have been made, that America is today on a gold standard. While the statement was not challenged, yet I heard rumblings which indicated that it did not meet with general acceptance.

I wish to reassert that statement, and to assure the Senator that under the law this Nation is on the gold standard today.

Mr. CONNALLY. Absolutely.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. In the act passed by the Congress giving the President the power to devalue the gold dollar, the same act provided that in the event he should exercise the power of devaluation, the new dollar, as devalued, should become the standard dollar of the country, and all dollars should be maintained on a parity in value with such new established gold dollar. The President accepted the power granted him by Congress, and reduced the value of the gold dollar from 25.8 grains of gold of 0.9 fineness to 15.521 grains of gold of 0.9 fineness. So the gold dollar back of all our money today contains 15 grains plus of gold.

In that connection, if the Senator will yield, I desire to place in the RECORD one or two statements from the daily statement of the United States Treasury of February 19, which I find on my desk this morning.

Mr. CONNALLY. I gladly yield.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. This statement shows that on February 19 the United States had in the Treasury the total sum in gold of $8,479,506,300.62. The same statement shows that on that date we had in silver in our Treasury the total sum of $732,219,535.82. Of course, if the value of that silver is based on its monetary value and not on its actual bullion value, the silver would approximate a billion dollars in monetary value. That gives the United States today gold and silver of an approximate value of nine and a half billion dollars.

Against that sum we have in circulation less than five and a half billion dollars. So today we could call in all the money in circulation of every kind and character and redeem that money in gold, and after it had all been redeemed, we would still have in our Treasury approximately $4,000,-000,000 of gold and silver, against which no money is in circulation.

I desired to have these figures appear in the RECORD at this point.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I thank the Senator for the insertion of that matter. In other words, the Treasury now has on hand gold stocks sufficient to redeem every dollar that is issued in paper money, every gold and silver certificate, and still have in its vaults a billion or so, after those obligations shall have been discharged. As bankers would say, the Treasury is in a liquid condition. It could pay off every depositor, if we were under the system of paying out gold in redemption of currency.

There is always the possibility, too, whenever the Government may need it, that the $2,000,000,000 now in the stabilization fund against which there has been issued no currency may be utilized as resources of the Treasury of the Government. That fund will not always be necessary for stabilization purposes. In fact, under the present clear enunciation of the policies of the Government, as sustained by the Supreme Court, I regard it as unnecessary to maintain any such vast sum in gold bullion in the Treasury simply for equalization purposes.

I thank the Senator. We are on a gold standard, Mr. Hoover to the contrary notwithstanding. We now have in the Treasury more gold than there are outstanding currency promises to pay.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Texas a question?

Mr. CONNALLY. I shall be very happy to endeavor to answer the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. GLASS. How can anyone get a dollar of that gold for redemption purposes?

Mr. CONNALLY. Is that the Senator's question?

Mr. GLASS. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator from Virginia asks me how is anyone going to get a dollar of that gold for redemption purposes. Under the law now he cannot go down to the Treasury and get a gold dollar, but let me say to the Senator—

Mr. GLASS. He cannot go anywhere and get it, can he?

Mr. CONNALLY. No; unless he goes abroad. He cannot get it unless he goes abroad.

Mr. GLASS. Yes; he cannot get it unless he goes to a foreign country and gets it.

Mr. CONNALLY. Yes. Let me answer the Senator now. Why does he want the gold dollar? When he goes down to get the gold dollar for redemption, why does he want it? Can he eat it? Does that gold sustain life? No; he does not eat it. Can he wear it? Not unless he wears it in imitation of the barbaric custom of the savages of wearing earrings and ornaments.

Mr. GLASS. He cannot wear it, he cannot eat it, and he cannot get it. He cannot get it! That is what I am talking about

Mr. CONNALLY. I shall answer the Senator.

Mr. GLASS. He cannot get it anywhere. The gold has been demonetized.

Mr. CONNALLY. In that sense.

Mr. GLASS. Then we are not on the gold standard.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator from Virginia believes that individuals should have dominion over gold. I believe that the Government ought to have dominion over gold, because gold is impressed with a public character. We are using it as money. We are using it as a standard of measure. And the only utility as money that gold or any other kind of money has is not in the fiber, it is not in its texture, it is not in its weight, it is not in its color, but it is in its worth to buy some article that can be worn, or can be eaten to sustain human life, or with which to exchange some other article for another. It is simply a yardstick. You do not consume it. Out here in the Bureau of Standards—

Mr. GLASS. You do not get it.

Mr. CONNALLY. No; he does not get it. He does not have to get it. I think that the standard of measurement of the money of the people—the agency which is employed as money—ought to be the Government's property and not the property of those who would seek merely to use it as an instrumentality to hold up the Government and to hold up the people and thereby, as Chief Justice Hughes said, undertake to "enrich" themselves at the expense of the Government.

Mr. GLASS. Oh, the Senator has passed from the amusing part of his speech to the rhetorical part of it. I agree with the Senator—

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator from Virginia is responsible for whatever errors the Senator from Texas has made in his undertaking to answer.

Mr. GLASS. I do not undertake to say that the Senator has made errors. I say he has been amusing.

Mr. CONNALLY. Well, the Senator from Virginia promotes amusement.

Mr. GLASS. I agree with the Senator that the Government should have dominion over money. But I hope the Senator will agree with the Senator from Virginia that when the Government has dominion over money it will keep every bill it issues. Let me read the Senator what the Government says. The Government says this $20 note that T have is Redeemable in gold on demand at the United States Treasury, or in gold or lawful money at the Federal Reserve banks.

And the Senator knows that is not true. He knows that it is a lie printed right on the face of that bill. He knows that it will not be redeemed except with another piece of paper. And so far from being on a gold standard, we are on a flat currency basis, and under the decision of the Supreme Court we are on a flat bond basis.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President-

Mr. CONNALLY. Permit me to answer the Senator from Virginia. I would never undertake to answer the Senator

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I have the floor.

Mr. CONNALLY. I beg the Senator's pardon. I thought

I yielded to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. LEWIS. I understand, Mr. President, that I have been recognized, and that I have the floor, but I am pleased to yield to any other Senator who desires it.

Mr. CONNALLY. I thank the Senator.

Mr. LEWIS. I just wanted to keep the record straight, Mr. President.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I do not undertake to answer the Senator from Virginia. The Supreme Court has already answered the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. GLASS. No; the Supreme Court has not answered the Senator from Virginia. The Supreme Court said that what Congress did was a cheat and a repudiation, and then it further said that those who had been cheated and those upon whom repudiation has been practiced, if they undertake to recover what the Government agreed to give them, can go to hell. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONNALLY. Well, Mr. President-

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President-

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator from Texas for the

Mr. CONNALLY. I have heard the Senator from Virginia debate on this money question repeatedly. I knew that he had very strong convictions, but not until this moment did I know how the very deeps of his nature have been stirred when I heard the language he employed in replying to me a moment ago.

Mr. President, I do not want to prolong this discussion. Permit me to say that I respect the Senator from Virginia and his views. We have fought this question out repeatedly. There is no occasion to go on endlessly from chapter to chapter, because I know that the Senator from Virginia is not going to change. I would not have him change. The Senator from Virginia is that fine, rugged type that when he gets a view he maintains it with courage and with high statesmanship. I am not undertaking to convince him.

When I have any cause I do not like to have, in the opposition army, scalawags and those who flee when the first gun is fired. I like to have men in the front ranks with stubborn tenacity and courage, and that is why, even despite the grief which I suffer because of his differing with the Senator from Texas, I am always proud to see standing in the front ranks the valiant Senator from Virginia.

One other word. The Senator says you cannot go down and get a gold dollar. No. There is a yardstick of measurement out in the Bureau of Standards, a metal bar 36 inches long. It is maintained there under conditions of temperature and light and scientific arrangement in order that that yardstick may be there not for every haberdasher who wants to go out and borrow it and take it down town and measure the length of his customer's breeches or his suits or his dry goods, but that is preserved there as a measurement of vardage.

My friends and Senators, that is what the gold dollar is doing now. It is yonder in the Treasury. It is there to its word and not swindle people, and not write a lie into | afford a standard of measurement for every citizen who sells a cow or a hog or a chicken, for every man, whether he comes from Virginia or from the West-a standard of measurement.

The Government says, "I have got this gold. It is impressed with a public character. I, the Government, am charged with responsibility to see that every citizen is treated fairly when it comes to the measurement of values. I, the Government, shall keep this money in my vaults, in my Treasury, not in some pawnbroker shop, not down the street in some hoarder's underground pit where he will seek to make a raid on these values by gathering as much as he can of the available gold supplies of the Nation." The Government says, "Under my high responsibility and under my duty to all the people I will keep this gold hoard, not for the speculator, but for all the people in these United States." And as long as the Senator from Virginia is here we all know that no injustice will ever be done to the people of America with regard to the dissipation of that gold hoard, until he has raised his voice in warning and protest. Those of us who respect him and love him will answer his call, and we shall see that just as in the cases before the courts every citizen and every dollar shall stand before the law equal in his rights and equal in the protection and security.

I thank the distinguished and the gracious Senator from Illinois for permitting me to trespass upon his time.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Vermont, who desires to place something in the RECORD.

Mr. AUSTIN. I now send to the desk Mr. Hoover's statement, which has been referred to in the speech of the Senator from Texas [Mr. Connally], and for which unanimous consent was obtained to be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of the speech of the Senator from Texas.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Permission was previously granted to have the statement printed in the RECORD at this

The statement by Mr. Hoover is as follows:

EXHIBIT A

I have now had opportunity to read the Supreme Court decision. Apparently all members of the Court agreed that the Government acted unconstitutionally in repudiation of the covenant on its own bonds.

NO REMEDY ANGLE CITED

A majority of the members concluded that the citizen has no remedy. That will have long moral consequences. But whatever the morals of right or wrong of the devaluation may be, the face of the American people must be forward.

The need and the opportunity now is to restore confidence in the field and the opportunity now is to restore confidence in the dollar. All threat, actual or potential, of further devaluation should now be removed. To do this and to give a needed contribution to real recovery the dollar should immediately be made convertible at the present 59 cents of gold, making it payable in gold bullion—the modern method of science payment.

There is no need to wait on foreign nations before we reestablish the gold standard and restore confidence in our currency. They would be bound to follow sometime. They are far more afraid of our doing just this than they are of any American managed currency, at which game they have us at a disadvantage.

FIVE REASONS LISTED

There are five compelling reasons for this action:

1. It would put more men to work out of the 12,000,000 who 1. It would put more men to work out of the 12,000,000 who still remain unemployed than any other single action. Unemployment rests today largely in the capital goods or construction industries. These industries are dependent largely upon long-term capital. The people are hesitant to invest their savings and take long-term risks because there is uncertainty in what value they will be repaid.

2. The Government's program of stimulating the capital goods and giving employment through public works can never result in 25 percent of the jobs which can be provided by recovery of normal private capital-goods activities. The otherwise inevitable Budget private capital-goods activities. The otherwise inevitable Budget deficits imply either impoverishing taxation or more devaluation or inflation. A convertible gold currency now would help avoid all these by aiding to restore employment and decrease the need

3. The devaluation which has already taken place has shown and will show in still higher costs of living. It affects every wage and salary earner. Surely a 60-percent cost-of-living increase, already now in prospect, should be enough without further increase beyond that level.

BOON TO CREDITORS

4. One of the declared purposes of devaluation was to, in effect, write down debts by increasing prices. Surely the debtors, who include most holders of common stock and equities in real property have secured enough if they get a 41-percent reduction. The creditors, who, in the modern world include every holder of a life-insurance policy, of a savings-bank deposit, a veterans' certificate, and every holder of a bond or a mortgage, deserve some consideration. It would be a boon to these if they were assured through immediate convertibility that they would not suffer any further. It would be a boon to our great endowed universities and hospitals if they knew that this is the end of their deprival.

5. We can get in appearance a false prosperity out of inflation. There is much inflation poison in the national blood through the combined effects of the devaluation, expanded bank deposits through Government borrowing, and the Federal Reserve credit policies. The fever may grow at any time. There is no real recovery on inflation medicine. If the currency were made convertible it would tend to check inflation, replace relief with real employment, and contribute materially to a general recovery.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, in view of the Supreme Court's gold decision, I arise to invite the Senate to a much more important, and, to my viewpoint, of a much more grave significance than that engaging the present discussion between the Senators from Texas and Virginia. I am attracted and my attention greatly arrested by the statement coming from the ex-President, Mr. Hoover, such as we have heard commented upon this morning; but my concern is as to a special feature of the whole matter which I now place open to this honorable body. It is one I feel worthy of the most serious consideration. The distinguished ex-President, sincere no doubt in his expression, seems to have found it agreeable to have written out the declarations uttered by him and so reported, immediately on the afternoon of the morning when the international press informed us that there was a meeting of delegates prepared for, to come from the countries called the "gold bloc", their names cited, the prospective place of meeting designated, those delegates representing Belgium, the Netherlands, Switzerland, aided by those who profess to be mere onlookers from France and

Mr. President, these delegates, if we take the report which will be found this morning from the State Department records and that which we read in the international press, seemed to have the opinion, as expressed by the eminent Senator from Virginia, that the highest court of our country has intimated to them they may take their gold claims to Tophet or some similar locality in any attempt on their part to drag gold from the Treasury of the United States under the pretense of a constitutional right.

The delegates of these lands, spoken of as the "gold bloc", intimate, as reported, they are preparing a proceeding at law to be lodged in some foreign tribunal—I take it they refer to the tribunal called the "International Court"—from which they may obtain some form of judgment which will evade the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States and give to the gold-bloc claimants a ruling to be announced in the international world as against the United States. This anticipated judgment is to compel the United States, in obedience to this undertaking of international nature, to reward their demands and pay them the full hundred cents upon every dollar in gold of every American security and American dollar they may lay hands on as owners or representatives.

Mr. President, I speak for myself, and in the presence of my colleagues I utter this warning if these lands abroad that are on the eve of abandoning for themselves what is called the gold standard and finding some form of a governed dollar, as they speak of it, shall assemble any form of ingenuity for the purpose of harassing the United States, reflecting upon its credit and balancing its honor in uncertainty by initiating such proceedings as have for their purpose the rendering of some judgment by some so-called "international tribunal" against this Republic, discrediting its honor and intimating by such decree that the United States is engaged, with the license of its own Supreme Court, in dishonoring its securities or robbing the holder of its paper. If in such manner as proposed it is assumed to control the full volume of all gold which may be due upon the securities of the industrial or commercial organizations of America or upon the Liberty bonds held abroad, I make bold here and now to say that if such nations and their representatives shall undertake such a course for the purpose either of humiliating our credit or embarrassing our Treasury while dishonoring this Republic, I would advise as retaliation that the Congress then proceed to pass an act authorizing this Government to attach the income payable from the United States on every security held by any foreign citizen whose nation is a part and parcel of this combination and threatened conspiracy. I would have the law compel credit entered upon the debts of the land which owes the United States either on account of the war debt or the debts due us, incurred since the war.

I call attention, sir, that two of these great governments have already charged this Government with being responsible in the doctrine or what is called in equity, as we lawyers speak of it, subrogated for any bond issued by any of the States of our land, where such is forfeited or declined by the States issuing it.

Only lately as against the State of Mississippi, one of the sovereign States of this Nation, one of the representatives of this threatened bloc has intimated that the Federal Government is responsible for bonds issued by the States, which they say have been repudiated, and that nation or its citizens demand that this Government be held through some appropriate proceedings to be liable for the face value of the securities of the State of Mississippi.

Mr. President, by virtue of the same doctrine of international law which eminent leaders of these foreign lands would advocate and urge at this time. I say they may carry on their threat if it pleases them to undertake it, but when it shall have been attempted I, for one, will urge upon the honorable Congress of our land the passing of such laws as will immediately pay to our United States a portion of the money due and owed by those governments which they have failed to pay, either principal or interest. I would order through a proper law the seizing of every dollar of the gold income that would otherwise go from the securities, commercial and industrial, of the United States or from the Liberty bonds which may be owned by foreign citizens and aliens and apply the full sum to the debt of their country, on the theory of their liability as citizens of such country for money we loaned for their protection and the rescue of their nation at the time it was in peril, both of life or death.

Therefore, sir, I rise at this moment to give an additional voice to that of the eminent Senator from Virginia [Mr. Glass] and the Senator from Texas [Mr. Connally] in the particular theme that has been entered upon for the moment. It is high time that this, my land, turn itself to some proper system looking to the collection of the debts which are due us in the amount of billions of dollars, that we may have enough money to meet the wages as to which we have heard debate day after day here in behalf of the toiler whose interest we are seeking to protect under the measure that is now pending. Also, sir, for the payment of such other sums as will provide what is called the "bonus" or compensation to the soldier now due him and for which he is demanding with tears in his heart.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President— Mr. LEWIS. I yield to my friend from Oklahoma.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Is it not a fact that there is not enough actual money today in circulation to pay the amount of the appropriation called for by the measure pending before us?

Mr. LEWIS. If my able friend means money that is used in business and circulated cutside the Treasury and the banks, I have to say "yes"; but if he means other forms of money, that which represents money, I will be compelled to advert to his own excellent declaration that nearly $8,000,000,000 of gold alone are now in the control of this Republic—sufficient to cover the immediate debts now payable.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. The record shows that we now have in circulation, theoretically, about $5,400,000,000. It is also conceded that about $500,000,000 of that money is in foreign countries—Cuba and other nations of the world. It is also admitted that $500,000,000 of that money is in circulation in the form of gold certificates, and while technically they are in circulation they are hid; they do not dare to show themselves, because the moment they do they are confiscated and converted. So the fact remains that there is not enough money in circulation in America to pay the appropriation contained in the joint resolution now pending before us.

I should like to ask one other question: Is it not a fact that there is not enough money in all the banks of America to pay the interest on the outstanding bonds of the United States?

Mr. LEWIS. It may be if all the interest on all the bonds were summoned to a single date that the able Senator is correct in his conclusion; but I rather gather that the payments are made on different periods, in different installments, and are made by such timely divisions as will enable us promptly to honor them.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I had reference to the actual interest on the Federal indebtedness.

Mr. LEWIS. I must accept the Senator's statement to be true.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. The Federal indebtedness at the present time is something like twenty-eight and a half billion dollars, and the indebtedness that we are about to create and the debt we will create by next year will make at the end of next year a total indebtedness resting upon the Government of approximately $35,000,000,000. At 3 percent the total interest bill would be more than a billion dollars, and tonight there will not be in all the banks of America actual money in excess of $750,000,000—less than $1,000,000,000. That is what we are facing today.

$1,000,000,000. That is what we are facing today.

Mr. LEWIS. And does my able friend from Oklahoma intimate that because of such status, assuming it to be true, we should now move to provide some other form of currency and at once add to the present volume sufficient to meet the demands to which he alludes?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, in view of the length of time I have occupied upon the floor in sustaining that position, I am surprised at the question. I am just asking if the Senator believes that it is good business to appropriate $5,000,000,000 when there is not enough money in America to pay the bill? Is it good business to keep on appropriating money at that rate when we have not enough money in all the banks to pay the interest for 1 year, without giving some consideration to putting a little more money in circulation so that the people will have a chance to get it in order to pay their interest and their bonds.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield to me for a moment?

Mr. LEWIS. Let me reply first to the Senator from Oklahoma. Whether I would favor the issuing of more circulation to meet the demands would depend on the form of the circulation, the nature of it, and the quality, as I would see it, in its value. I now yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. COUZENS. The Senator from Oklahoma asked the Senator from Illinois whether the pending joint resolution should be passed in view of the fact that there is not enough money in the United States, and he stated the amount of monetary circulation. I wonder if the Senator would tell us the amount of the checks in circulation?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Does the Senator mean good checks or bad checks, or both?

Mr. COUZENS. I am only referring to good checks, because it is against the law to issue bad checks.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. This Nation is being financed today by bad checks.

Mr. COUZENS. The Senator says it is?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. It is. A check is written and comes in for payment, and the Government then writes a larger check to take up the one coming in and to provide a little more time to meet the next one. This Nation today is being financed by a system of "kiting" checks, and every one is bad, because none of them can be paid and they are not being paid.

Mr. COUZENS. I think, then, the Democratic Department of Justice ought to indict someone for issuing fake checks, because that is against the Federal law.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, is it not a fact that the banks of this country own nearly $16,000,000,000 of United States bonds, upon which they may borrow at any time through the Federal Reserve banks their credit and their notes, if there were business demands sufficient to warrant the issuance of credit and notes?

Mr. COUZENS. That is quite correct, and that is why I was trying to get the Senator from Oklahoma to say that the volume of business in the United States is not affected in any sense by the circulation of money, as he describes it.

Mr. GLASS. No; because 92 percent of the business of the country is done by check, as the Senator from Michigan knows.

Mr. LEWIS. Of course, Mr. President, it was not my intent to launch myself upon the general discussion touching the value of money based on metals or its expansion. It is evident to all that much of the value of our money depends on credit at this time; but there is no necessity for me to enter upon that subject under the theme I entered this discussion.

I have expressed the object of my rising. I still insist that it is timely for us to consider something of the collection of these foreign debts now due us, and particularly so in the face of the threats on the part of those who are interested in embarrassing us if we shall not pay, as they have it, immediately dollar for dollar for their securities in immediate gold. I have presented the thoughts such as I wanted to express as a proper retaliation for those who shall assume to humiliate this land in that way. I am seeking that our country shall at the appropriate time take such course as becomes a free and independent land. We truly must confess our situation, not as one of fate but in the caustic confession—

The fault, dear Brutus, is not in our stars, But in ourselves, that we are underlings.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I wish to make one observation, and that is to express wonder at what our foreign debtors will think of the measure of our sincerity in reproaching them for repudiating their indebtedness to us when the Congress itself has repudiated the most sacred indebtedness that any nation on earth ever incurred—the indebtedness which was incurred with which to fight the last World War.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, may I make just one further statement. I was not here, unfortunately, when the World War was fought, but if my recollection of history serves me correctly, during that war, in financing it, we issued something like $26,000,000,000 of gold bonds. The Congress and the agents of the Government had printed and made promises to pay $26,000,000,000 of gold in the redemption of those bonds. The agents of the Government at that time must have known that there was not half that much gold in the entire world.

The statement was made a while ago that some of our money bears an inscription that will not bear the closest scrutiny. I agree; but it occurs to me, as to the responsibility for the issuing of $26,000,000,000 of bonds, each bond carrying a promise to pay gold, that the responsible authorities ought to have known there was not half that much monetary gold in all the world; and they must have known the time would come, sooner or later, when this promise would turn out to be exactly as the Senator from Virginia [Mr. Glass] has described it in connection with the bill which he exhibited to the Senate a few moments ago.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, of course, when the Government incurred a bonded indebtedness of $26,000,000,000 with which to fight the war it was done upon the established theory our banking experience of 150 years had taught us that less than 5 percent of a gold-redemption fund was required to redeem gold bonds and currency. No sane person ever imagined that all of those bonds would become due at the same time or that they would not be refunded into other bonds at a differing rate of interest whenever they should become due. Therefore, the plea that there was not gold enough in the world to meet all of those bonds at one time is, I say, without offense to any Senator, to me quite fanciful.

Not only that, but I invite attention to the fact that at the time those bonds were issued promising payment in gold we repudiated the promise.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, can the Senator from Virginia see any difference between what the Wilson administration did in selling gold short and what Andy Mellon did in selling stocks short?

Mr. GLASS. Oh, yes; I can see a vast difference.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I desire to propound a question to the Senator from Virginia. A good deal has been heard about the incapacity of the Government and debtors in this country to pay their gold obligations because there is not sufficient gold to go around. I do not know a great deal about this subject, but, so far as the debt-paying power of the dollar is concerned, I do not look upon a gold dollar or any other dollar as simply a cartridge to be fired and then cast aside. Here is the question I desire to submit to the Senator from Virginia:

In the United States today there is indebtedness of various kinds, public and private, interest-bearing and non-interestbearing, aggregating about $250,000,000,000. We have in circulation today, in all forms, money amounting to about $5,500,000,000, or a little less. Does it follow that we can never pay this $250,000,000,000 at all because we have only $5,500,000,000 in money? Are not the two propositions parallel? If we cannot pay $100,000,000,000 of gold debts because we have only $5,000,000,000 in gold, does it not follow that if we owe $250,000,000,000 of debts payable in currency we can never pay that currency debt because we have not enough currency to discharge the obligation-not enough currency to go around?

Mr. GLASS. Of course, the propositions are twins. The Senator knows that to be so.

Mr. GORE. I should like to make one other observation. It is an old story but illustrates the point.

It is the story of the clown in the circus. There were 19 other men standing with the clown and forming a ring. The clown happened to find in his pocket a silver dollar, such as this [exhibiting]. He turned to the man on his left and said, "I owe you $2. I find I have a dollar I did not know I had, and I will pay you half of the debt that I owe The man to his left said the same thing to the man on his left, and it went around until the man on the right of the clown said the same thing to the clown and paid him half of his debt with the silver dollar.

The clown casually dropped it in his pocket. A moment later he happened to rediscover the dollar in his pocket, turned to the man on his left, and said, "By the way, I have a dollar I did not know I had. I am going to pay you off in full, pay you all I owe you", which he did. The man on his left said that same thing to the man on his left, and it went on around the ring until the man on the clown's right said to him, "I am going to pay you off in full." He did so by handing him the silver dollar. Thus $40 of debt had been paid in a few minutes with only one "dishonored" silver dollar. [Laughter.] "Thus runs the world away."

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Chaffee, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House insisted upon its amendment to the bill (S. 1190) to regulate interstate and foreign commerce in petroleum and its products by prohibiting the shipment in such commerce of petroleum and its products produced in violation of State law, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the Senate; agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mr. COLE of Maryland, Mr. Pettengill, Mr. Kelly, Mr. Mapes, and Mr. Wolverton were appointed managers on the part of the House at the conference.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED

The message also announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 49) authorizing the use of public parks, reservations, and other public spaces in the District of Columbia; and the use of tents, cots, hospital appliances, flags, and other decorations, property of the United States, by Washington (D. C.) 1935 did not have half as much gold as we have now when we have | Shrine Committee, Inc., and for other purposes, and it was signed by the President pro tempore.

WORK-RELIEF PROGRAM

The Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 117) making appropriations for relief purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. Mc-CARRAN] in the nature of a substitute for the amendment of the committee.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, in the remarks I am about to make I have tried to achieve a certain continuity. I hope Senators will not interrupt me until I shall have completed what I have to say.

Whatever any of us may feel about the merits of House Joint Resolution 117, no one can question that it is of real importance to the American people that legislation covering an expenditure of nearly $5,000,000,000 should be carefully and wisely framed.

Unemployment is very wide-spread in our country, and it is not in any way out of order for the Chief Executive of the country to ask of the Congress legislation to remedy the situation, nor is it out of order for him to suggest the form of the remedy as he has done in the joint resolution, which comes to us in practically the form that it was introduced in the House of Representatives by the administration. Neither is it in any way out of order for us in every way possible to seek light on the measure and to amend it according to our wisdom.

The House Committee on Appropriations held a short hearing on the measure, and whatever information was therein elicited is available to the Senate.

The Senate Committee on Appropriations has been in session for more than 2 weeks examining persons connected with the framing of the resolution and various emergency and public-works administrators and considering the joint resolution. About all that we have been definitely able to bring out is that the intent of the joint resolution is to put to work, on an entirely indefinite public-works program, 3,500,000 of the five-million-odd individuals now on the relief rolls and receiving either direct or work relief from the F. E. R. A.

The intention of the joint resolution as introduced in the House is to pay these individuals an average of $50 a month, a sum greater than they are now receiving from the relief agencies but not equal to the wages in effect in private industry.

The Appropriations Committee of the Senate has amended the joint resolution by adopting the Russell amendment, which provides that whenever the wage provided by the Government leads to a reduction of the wage scale of industry in any locality, the wage shall be brought up to that of industry.

The President is to have full discretion to decide upon the projects to be undertaken and generally to administer the fund through such agencies as he may see fit to set up; and penalties are provided for failure to comply with the rules and regulations that he or his subordinate agencies may set up.

The fund provided for carrying out the joint resolution includes a direct appropriation of $4,000,000,000, which is to be used for the aforesaid purposes, and $880,000,000 transferred from balances of appropriations already made and existing funds in the hands of the Government. It is estimated that $130,000,000 of this $880,000,000 will be used to carry on the work of the C. C. C. until June 30 of the present year and $750,000,000 to meet the requirements of the F. E. R. A. until the 3,500,000 persons on relief are transferred over to the work relief provided for in the joint

The entire appropriation of $4,880,000,000 is to be administered as one fund, and no limitations are placed on the amount that may be used for direct relief or work relief.

The Appropriations Committee has reported certain changes in the House joint resolution which I think are beneficial, but in general the purport of the measure remains unchanged.

Whatever one may think of the policies of the present administration which have led up to the present system of relief to the unemployed, every one will admit that Federal relief could not be shut off in its entirety at the present time without involving untold hardships to a large number of people in the country. I think it is generally conceded by humane people all over the country that people must not and shall not be permitted to starve or suffer from exposure, and that if other formerly accepted agencies cannot thus care for the unemployed the Federal Government must step in. At this moment the Federal Government is in and for some time to come it probably will continue to be in.

I do not regard the pending measure as a party issue. Relief of some kind has to be provided. I shall try to set forth briefly some of the reasons why I personally do not believe the joint resolution in its present form to be wise legislation.

The constitutional objections to the measure I shall not go into. I am not enough of a constitutional lawyer to make my opinion, one way or the other, of value. The abdication by the Congress of its right and duty to determine the manner in which such enormous sums of money shall be spent, and the delegating of vast powers to the President, I deplore; but that point of view has already been demonstrated by Senators on both sides of the Chamber, and in general I am in accord with their views.

What I do object to, and what will cause me to vote against the measure unless the Senate shall see fit to amend it is the proposition to spend $4,000,000,000 for work relief to keep up the morale of the 3,500,000 unemployed when for a fourth of that amount of direct relief, or less, we could easily carry them through the coming year. Whether a man who is out of work receives direct relief from the Government or is given a job by the Government on work that the Government does not need to have done and certainly cannot afford to have done, he is in both cases receiving a dole from his Government: and the delicate discrimination between the two kinds of dole does not warrant the strain to the credit of the country that the borrowing of $3,000,-000,000 will inevitably bring about at this time.

Neither is it a benefit to the future of our people to build up the feeling that the Government owes a Government job to all of its unemployed citizens. It never has had that duty, and it can never assume such an obligation for the future with any possibility of carrying it out unless the Government also is given the right to regulate the birth rate in the country-a form of Government meddling that I do not believe even the new deal would stand for.

The assumption by the Government of the obligation to furnish jobs to its unemployed citizens means that in the future, whenever bad times come and people lose their jobs, the Government, instead of retrenching on its expenditures, must take just the opposite course; and at just the time when it ought to economize to meet its decreased revenues, at just the time when its credit is most under a strain, it must further weaken that credit by borrowing large sums of money to give unnecessary jobs to its unemployed.

It is argued and constantly asserted by the proponents of this measure that turning loose on the country $4,000,000,000 of wages will cause industry to revive, and that in this way the depression will be brought to an end.

We have already spent on work relief, including the publicworks expenditures, the C. C. C., and the C. W. A., nearly $3,000,000,000. I cannot see that the depression is in any way being brought to a close when the number of unemployed, instead of decreasing, is increasing or at least holding its own, and the relief rolls, instead of decreasing, are increasing.

The scant wages of $50 a month contemplated in this measure give to the recipient twice what he gets under direct relief. He will use it, in all probability, to purchase for himself and his dependents somewhat better food and better clothing than the recipients under direct relief. The benefits which a few industries which furnish those necessities will | ing again as they turned before.

receive will not bring general prosperity to the country. What we need, if we are to get back to prosperity, is to start up again the thousand and one industries, large and small, that cater to the wants of the prosperous, and thereby give work all over the country to people who are now out of work, because the formerly prosperous cannot, with their diminishing incomes, afford to buy.

The farmers of the country, the laborers, the clerks, when the country is prosperous, spend their money on more than the bare necessities of life; but, after all, their spendings on luxuries cover very few of the vast number of businesses that go to make up industry in this country. Only when all classes are spending can we have any real prosperity.

Public-works plans for purposes similar to those contemplated in this joint resolution have been tried in other countries. Great Britain has made the experiment and has given it up. Her reply to the recent questionnaire of the League of Nations as to the value of public-works programs was as

The experiment of large public works as a method of dealing with unemployment has been tried and has failed, and it is not intended to repeat it. The expansion of normal activity will most surely and rapidly be brought about by the creation of confidence, particularly by a balanced budget, the lowering of the rate of interest, and facilities for the removal of hindrances to trade.

With the British point of view, as expressed in this reply to the League of Nations, I thoroughly agree.

We have already spent on work relief more than $2,800,-000,000; and, as I have said, I cannot see many signs of business revival.

Lack of business confidence is what ails America, and great and expensive building programs, which must necessarily add to the national debt, which weaken our credit, and which must in some way be paid for by increased taxation, are not conducive to building up business confidence.

No country can have prosperity unless its owners of capital see a chance to profit by the investment of their capital, and its business men and women see a chance profitably to conduct their business.

Since the panic of 1929 it has been the fashion to run down big business and the confidence of the people in the judgment and integrity of the managers of industry has been deliberately broken down. This feeling has now spread to such an extent that all successful business men are looked on with suspicion.

Without doubt, big business has in the past done shady things, and certain improper and indefensible acts have been proven against some of the heads of industry in the United States; but that the bulk of the business men of this country are corrupt or even unfair in their methods has not been proved, and-the new deal to the contrary notwithstanding-will not be proved, because it is not a fact.

American business men, many of whom have sprung from the ranks of industry, through the generations have built up the commercial strength of the United States and are largely responsible for developing our national resources and for making us the richest and greatest country in the world. Without their aid and their guidance and their achievements the United States never could have occupied the position that she now occupies as the foremost commercial nation in the world.

It is a serious matter to break down the faith of the people in their men of business. In every community, large or small, these men are the solid, influential citizens who lead their fellow citizens and largely determine community sentiment. Shatter that faith throughout the country and the backbone of the country is broken. The demagog-and there are plenty of them in every community-comes into his own and is quick to take the opportunity to get in his destructive work. That is precisely what we are facing in this country.

If, as a result of the world-wide depression which culminated in the panic of 1929, the wheels of industry have slowed down and are threatening to stop altogether, the business men of the country and not the legislators of the country are the only ones who can start those wheels turnYou can turn loose on the country your doles, your work relief, your pensions, your bonuses, all the gifts that the people have been told will put money in circulation and bring back better times, and you will get no prosperity unless the business of the country feels that it can go ahead on a sound financial basis and make adequate profits on its investment.

Panics we have had before. We have worked out of them because our people have had confidence in their country. Where is that confidence now?

In the past few years I do not recall hearing anyone boast of being an American, boast of the freedom enjoyed in the country, boast of our resources, our wealth, our standard of living and our achievements, boast of our honor and our keeping of faith.

I recall very well the League of Nations fight in the Senate in 1920 when the Senate decided that we could not accept article 10 of the treaty, which obligated us to go to war under certain conditions, because if we did so, no matter what other nations might do under the obligations of this article, the United States, at whatever cost, would live up to its given word. We have not seen much of this spirit of late.

Constantly we hear the words, "We must never go back to what we had before." And yet, a few years ago, as a Nation, we were the envy of the civilized world, and we were proud of that distinction.

We were proud that we had more automobiles than any other nation in the world, more radios, more miles of railroad, more telephones, more of almost all the material things used in modern civilization. We were perhaps somewhat blatant over our prosperity, but back of it all there was a real pride in our country, its form of government, and its achievements, and there was something fine in that pride.

The panic of 1929 itself was due as much as anything else to our pride and our confidence—which in this case was overconfidence—in our ability to handle the overproduction which the late 1920's saw in this country.

In those days we believed in our captains of industry. We overestimated their capacity to pull us out of an inevitable, oncoming economic disaster.

We speculated madly in the stocks of industry and we invested in the bonds of industry because we thought that our supercaptains could somehow pull us through. We had confidence, too much confidence, and necessarily we paid for it.

Now the pendulum has swung the other way. We have no confidence at all, and this is worse than overconfidence.

If, at the present time, we had in us a little of the spirit of confidence of 1925–28 we would soon get out of the depression in which we find ourselves.

I think that everyone in the country, with the exception of those who want to try out new theories of government, would like to see prosperity come back to us.

Even in the days of our greatest prosperity, when everything was going well in the land, there were people who insisted that everything was going wrong, and that their own panaceas were the pathway to the millenium.

It is unfortunate that these people should be allowed to use the depression to foster the trying out of their ideas on the American people. For the past 2 years these people have had a chance that no gang of innovationists and reformers in the history of the world has ever had before to experiment almost ad libitum on the richest and greatest country the world has ever seen. They are the ones who are crying that we must never go back to what we had before. This is their opportunity. They well know that with the return of prosperity they go back into the discard.

Their experiments have cost the country a vast sum of money, and up to date I think I may say that nearly every one of their experiments has failed to do what it was intended to do, and has proved just so much of a set-back to returning prosperity.

Furthermore, I am sorry to say that certain other classes of people, not as visionary, not as impracticable as those to whom I have alluded, have also used the depression and are using it now to better the status of their own particular class.

The soldiers of the country think that this is the time for the Government to pay the adjusted-service certificates. The aged of the country and the people who have to support them think that this is the time to provide old-age insurance. The workers think that they need unemployment insurance. Labor calls for short hours and no cutting down of wages, and so forth, and so forth.

All of these calls, worthy as they may be in themselves, are just so much of a setback at this time to any return to prosperity. Only in times of prosperity could the business of the country and the Government of the country ever hope to pay the bills for these largesses to the people.

The business of the country, which can barely stagger along under the existing load, can certainly never carry on with the added burdens which it must earn the money to pay, and unless it does earn the money to pay, we may put all the legislation on the statute books that can be enacted, but the benefits will not accrue.

Of what advantage will it be to the veterans of the country to get the payment of their adjusted-service certificates, to the old people of the country to get their old-age pensions, to the workers of the country to get their unemployment insurance, to labor to get its shorter hours and high pay, if the result of all of these raids on the Treasury is going to mean the breaking down of the credit of the United States, the rapid reduction of the value of the dollar, and the further shutting down of the business of the country?

We are too good a country to allow ourselves to crash. Most of us are pretty good Americans. In times like these we ought all to get together for America, forget our own particular hobbies, and all pull together to get our country back to the normal, safe, and generally profitable condition in which for so many years we have taken pride.

Great lessons we have learned from the depression. Lawless business methods we will not condone, and by legislation we will stop them. More Government supervision where manifest evils have developed we shall undoubtedly need. But one thing we have happily not learned, and that is that we can afford to kill the goose that lays the golden egg— American business.

The problem of the Government does not greatly differ from the problem of the individual head of a family in this period of depression. Like the Government, the head of a family must figure how he and those dependent on him are going to pull through. His business, like that of the Government, is languishing, his credit at the bank is strained. What does he do? Does he decide that now is the time for him further to strain his credit at the bank by borrowing further sums of money, if he is able to do so, to fix up his home and install modern improvements which will make him more comfortable, but will not bring him in any added income; that now is the time to settle an annuity on his wife's mother who lives at his home; to set aside a further sum of money to take care of his help in case they lose their jobs, and to cut down the hours of work of his employees with no decrease in their pay? He does not. He uses his every resource to bolster up his credit with his bank. He takes in his belt a hole or two. He economizes in every way that he can, and he hangs on with his toes and his teeth until times get better. He expects full team work on the part of his family to help him hang on. This is not a bad program for our Government to follow.

I believe that we have reached the point in Government expenditures where the credit of the Government demands the utmost economy in our appropriations; that as far as possible appropriations should be limited to what will enable us to function efficiently as a government, and furnish food and shelter to such of our unemployed as it may be found impossible to care for through State or local agencies.

The figures show that the F. E. R. A. is taking care of direct relief of the unemployed at an average expense of $25 a month. The administration security wage plan would cost an average of $50 a month for wages and an additional amount of nearly $50 a month per individual for materials, or substantially $100 a month for work relief.

The Russell amendment allowing the security wage in localities where it did not result in the lowering of the wage scale would in any event cost as much as the administration's plan and an additional amount to cover cases where the higher wage scales were adopted.

The McCarran amendment would involve additional cost for every amount per hour that the average under the wage scale exceeded the 40-cent average of the administration plan. Taking the figures of Mr. Gill, an expert in the F. E. R. A., the additional cost under the McCarran amendment would be something over $2,000,000,000. This estimate is based on an average wage scale of 80 cents an hour. That average Mr. Gill himself stated was in all probability higher than was warranted, but he also stated that he did not believe that it could be kept below 70 cents an hour. An average of 60 cents an hour would involve an increase of $1,000,000,000.

The proponents of the amendment argue that the same number of men could be employed as under the administration plan by working less hours, and the projects could be planned to come within the four billions provided in the joint resolution. The fact remains that for every dollar of material required for the completion of any project a certain number of work-hours are necessary for utilization of that material.

At an average labor cost of 40 cents an hour and a 30-hour week, the cost of labor and material are substantially equal. Any raise in the labor cost per hour above 40 cents, to meet which the number of hours of labor per week must be cut down, must involve either the employment of more men per week or the use of less material per week, which would mean the prolonging of the work on projects at additional expense.

I prefer the Russell amendment to the McCarran amendment because I believe it to be more economical. I prefer the administration plan to the Russell plan for the same reason. I prefer the Adams amendment to the administration plan because it cuts off $2,000,000,000 from the appropriation in the joint resolution, and I would cheerfully vote to cut down the Adams amendment another billion and limit the expenditures by the President to direct relief.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Thomas of Utah in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCarran].

Mr. LEWIS. I announce that the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. Overton] is detained on account of illness, that the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] is detained on account of illness in his family, and that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. Barkley] is necessarily detained from the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ADAMS in the chair). Ninety-two Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, in my judgment, the pending joint resolution is even broader in its terms than the previous authority which has been delegated to the Executive to carry on the public-works program or any of the other relief programs that have been heretofore authorized.

A reading of the joint resolution, it seems to me, demonstrates that it conveys all the authority which was previously conveyed in the authorization for the $3,300,000,000 works program and also for the relief program which was authorized by the previous Congress.

Regardless of this authorization to the Executive, all efforts to earmark any of the funds proposed to be appropriated by the joint resolution failed. Furthermore, it was absolutely impossible for us to get any information as to how these funds were going to be used or what specific amounts were going to be used for certain projects. I wish to recite a little of the testimony with reference to the efforts made on the part of the Appropriations Committee of the Senate to obtain this information.

I find this question was asked on page 51 of the hearings:

Now, someone ought to have the information as to how much additional funds can be spent on rivers and harbors, and what I am trying to find out is whether you can tell us, and if not, can you give us the names of persons who can tell us what the possibilities are?

Admiral Proples. In reply to that, Senator, the Corps of Engineers of the Army have a program for the improvement of rivers and harbors and flood control aggregating in all about $8,000,000,000.

In other words, we find that they suggested these large amounts with no showing whatever whether or not any of the money could be used for the specific projects, no detail as to how much could be used, and a general statement that the whole matter was up to the disposition of the President.

I find on page 52 of the hearings that the chairman, the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] presiding, said:

I think undoubtedly we can save time if we ask the admiral to furnish the committee with the estimates upon which the drafters of this bill arrived at the $4,880,000,000 is to be expended.

Admiral Peoples later said, on the same page:

I would say that the President himself emphasized the necessity for a lump-sum appropriation, pointing out the physical impossibility of surveying, weighing, and testing each and every project at this time. He indicated also that a substantial portion of the appropriation would be used for the objectives suggested in the report of the National Resources Board.

On page 53 I find the following:

Senator Dickinson. It seems to me that you could do this, You could call the heads of the bureaus together to a central bureau, and ask them to give you the information. Every bureau can pick out projects that they would like to see go through and that they are prepared to handle to take care of emergencies, and to take care of labor.

In response to the demand of the committee, Admiral Peoples did bring back a list of projects involving a potential outlay of some $32,000,000,000, but he did not segregate or break down any of the projects and tell how much could be used on any one of them. That list is found on page 60 of the hearings. Admiral Peoples there says:

As a result of our studies, after investigation of types of projects before the Public Works Administration, the Emergency Relief Administration, and other organizations, we can furnish what I should call a reservoir of desirable projects from which the President may make allocations to furnish jobs, at the compensation indicated, to the number of people drawing direct relief. For the information of the committee, I set forth this list:

Slum clearance and urban housing, the approximate reservoir from which to draw, probably $6,000,000,000.

Rural housing, about $2,000,000,000.

Rural highways, $5,000,000,000.

Rural electrification, $300,000,000.

Rural electrification, $300,000,000. Reforestation, submarginal lands, $850,000,000. Soil erosion, $300,000,000.

Special Federal projects, $180,000,000.

Community sanitation and health control, $125,000,000.

Non-Federal projects, $7,500,000,000.

Rivers and harbors, and so forth, about $8,000,000,000.

Stream pollution, $380,000,000.

Making an approximate grand total of over $32,000,000,000.

That is about all the information the committee had as to the various projects on which this tremendous sum can be used or will be used. The question was then asked:

Senator Dickinson. What we should like to know is, What is the amount that can be spent promptly in putting people to work on the various projects that are now available? Senator Hale. Break it down.

Senator Dickinson. Break it down, so that we will know "where we are at."

Admiral Peoples replied:

Senator, there have been no lists of any approved individual projects predetermined, or which can be predicted in advance.

Senator Dickinson. But can we not have some idea as to the possibilities in these various projects?

Admiral Peoples. Take, for illustration, any community like, say, Atlanta: The regional director there would submit a list of desirable projects to put the unemployed in that city to work. His list might be $40,000,000. Each of the projects that he lists will then have to be carefully surveyed and weighed and determined. Some of them be $40,000,000. Each of the projects that he lists will then have to be carefully surveyed and weighed and determined. Some of them may be slum-clearance projects. There might be items of grade crossings there. Some of them may be sanitation items, and so forth. If that list runs the gantlet of inspection and critical analysis, the specific projects approved might be cut down to $20,000,000. Say there are only 20,000 unemployed there. In that case $20,000,000 would be enough.

Senator Dickinson. Is not this more or less a continuation of the program we have had under the Public Works Administration, wherein you spent $3,000,000,000 during the past year?

Admiral Peoples. Many of the projects to be selected would be of the same kind; yes, sir.

Senator Dickinson. Have they not been making surveys, and have they not had boards in various States making these surveys of the possible improvements in the different States, and are not their reports on file?

Admiral Peoples. I know that the Public Works Administration have received requests amounting to the figure they gave me of $2,000,000,000.

This is a confession, in my judgment, that we are continuing the same program we have had under the Public Works Administrator. I do not believe the success achieved under the Public Works Administrator warrants us in making an appropriation of $4,000,000,000. My reasons for so suggesting is, in the first place, that they have not been able to put people to work in the number that is necessary if we are going to relieve the country of the unemployment situation that now exists.

I find in the House RECORD of January 24 last that Representative Luplow, of Indiana, said:

When I asked recently how many persons had been put to work as the result of the $3,300,000,000 former public-works program, the personnel director of the Public Works Administration gave the number as less than 900,000. At this rate, it would require an expenditure of $44,000,000,000 to give temporary synthetic employment to 11,000,000 people now out of work. This, in my judgment, shows the absolute futility and utter hopelessness of the public-works program as a means of solid national recovery.

I find upon reading the Treasury statement of today that has just been brought to my desk-

Mr. KING. Mr. President

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. DICKINSON. I yield.

Mr. KING. I should like to ask the Senator whether the only testimony which was before the committee warranting any appropriation for public works or relief was that of Admiral Peoples, and if there was additional testimony, from whom did it emanate, and, generally and in concise form, what did it demonstrate?

Mr. DICKINSON. The only additional testimony the committee had was that of the Budget Director, and that went largely to the matter of the authorship of the joint resolution and what was within its scope. I think that developed the thought that the whole $4,880,000,000 could be used either for direct relief or for work relief just as ordered by the Executive.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator permit another interruption? Mr. DICKINSON. Certainly.

Mr. KING. Was there anything to indicate whether any part of this stupendous sum may be used for military purposes, such as the building of airplanes and airships and naval craft or the construction of additional fortifications?

Mr. DICKINSON. There was no indication of that kind. The first indication of that kind I have seen was brought to my attention when House bill 5913 was reported to the House of Representatives, that bill being the appropriation bill for the War Department. If the Senator will turn to page 10 of that bill, he will find the following words, beginning at line 12-

Mr. KING. Is the Senator reading from the bill itself?

Mr. DICKINSON. I am reading from House bill 5913, being the Army appropriation bill as reported to the House of Representatives. It is my hope, I will say to the Senator from Utah, that the provision I am about to read will be stricken from the bill in the House. I have faith in the House that they will not permit this bill to pass in the form in which it was reported to the body.

Mr. KING. I should like to ask one other question: Is there anything in the measure which is now under consideration, the joint resolution before us, which would prohibit the use of these funds for military or naval purposes?

Mr. DICKINSON. There is absolutely nothing of that kind. It is subject to the discretion of the Executive. In view of the fact that this subject has been brought up. I wish to refer now to the joint resolution and to suggest that it is drawn in such broad terms that the money to be appropriated may be used for practically any purpose within the mind of the Chief Executive.

Yesterday my attention was called to the provisions of the appropriation bill to which I have referred, being House bill 5913, as it was reported to the House of Representatives. Beginning in line 12, page 10, I read the following:

Pay of enlisted men of the line and staff, not including the Philippine Scouts, $51,069,333, together with such additional sums as may be necessary under this and other appropriations contained in this act to defray the cost of increasing, at the discretion of the President and in such increments as he may deem necessary from time to time, the enlisted strength of the Regular Army from an average of 118,750 to an average of 165,000 enlisted men.

That provision would indicate to me that it is proposed to grant a blanket authority to increase the Army by some 50,000 men and to pay for the enlisted personnel out of the relief funds appropriated by the pending measure before the Senate, not provided for in the appropriation act but provided for from the appropriations in the pending relief measure, House Joint Resolution 117, which we are now considering and which is before the Senate. That provision, I hope, will be changed, for the reason that it grants too broad an authority to be left in an appropriation bill if the House of Representatives and the Senate are to retain any control whatsoever over the purse strings of the Nation.

I have another reason for thinking that this sum is too large. I am one of those who voted for the Adams amendment to cut the appropriation down to $1,880,000,000. I now stand ready to vote for any amount the administration may say is necessary in order to provide all the additional funds which may be necessary to carry on the relief program of the administration. I believe that there could be many economies practiced in the relief program, but I do not believe the Government of the United States can afford to take the stand that we are going to permit people in the United States really to be hungry. On the other hand, I do not believe, in view of the experience we have had with the $3,000,000,000 public-works program, that it is possible for the administration to use within the limit of 1 year the amount of money for which they are asking in the pending joint resolution.

If it cannot be used within the limit of a year, and we are going to be in session. I hope, a year from now, why should not we appropriate the necessary amount to carry on for 12 months, and then reconsider the matter next year and appropriate such amount as may be necessary to meet the situation existing at that time?

If we will turn to the Treasury statement which came to our desks this morning, dated February 18, and look at page 4, where will be found the emergency program of the Public Works Administration, we will find still in the Treasury of the United States $1,506,000,000 of the moneys heretofore appropriated for the public-works program for the purpose of relieving distress. We all know we cannot relieve distress by leaving the money in the Treasury of the United States. Yet, with all the projects, the most favorable ones which were reported, we find the administration has not been able to put to work the number of people expected. On the other hand, they have not been able to spend in a judicious way the money that has been given them.

Secretary Ickes testified before the committee that they had not accepted a single, solitary new application since February 28, 1934. That gives some idea of how long it has taken the administration really to put people to work when they had the authority to do it and when they had the money in the Treasury with which to pay the bills. It gives some idea of the impracticability of the President's program as it is now being presented.

Here I should like to read into the Record a paragraph or two from the column headed "The great game of politics", by Frank R. Kent, which appears in the Baltimore Sun of today. It is headed "No information yet", and is dated Washington, February 20, and reads:

The striking thing about the pending $5,000,000,000 work-relief bill continues to be the cloak of mystery with which the plans for the expenditure of this vast sum are enshrouded. After weeks of effort neither the Senate, the House, nor the press has been able to get anything other than the vaguest and most cloudy outline.

Actually, there really isn't any mystery about it. Nor is it sheer perverseness upon the part of the administration. The quite obvious reason for the cloak is that there are no plans of a concrete nature. This is another one of those planless plans, recently referred to by a distinguished interpreter of the new deal who occasionally becomes skeptical of the outcome.

The pleasant habit of this administration is to launch the experiment first and then invent the method of conducting it.

In this instance, not only the plans for spending the money but the man to direct the spending has not been disclosed. Many believe the second is as nebulous as the first.

Quoting further, Mr. Kent says, referring to General Wood, who is the head of Sears, Roebuck & Co., of Chicago:

Whether General Wood knows that he is to be window dressing and is consciously willing to lend his aid in that way, there is no means of knowing. His record shows a very full and useful life without any apparent touch with politics. It may easily be, therefore, that he is misled as to the true character of advisory boards, particularly advisory boards in this administration. If that is so, almost any posted observer in this vicinity can tell him that advisory boards, consumers' councils, and emergency commissions are not taken seriously save by the completely unsophisticated.

The truth is that of all the various kinds of bunk which char-

The truth is that of all the various kinds of bunk which characterize the new deal, consumers' councils and advisory boards are the sheerest and most complete. Membership on them is the most futile form of political existence, and no practical man worth his salt can tolerate them for any length of time.

There still are plenty of people who regard consumers' councils and advisory boards seriously, but there are none such in the United States Senate. There the curiosity about who will be the directing head and how the money is to be spent continues unabated and unsatisfied bated and unsatisfied.

That, in my judgment, shows some of the uncertainties with which the full program is surrounded.

Next I want to call attention to the fact that the workrelief program has not relieved. From the United States Daily of February 11 I quote as follows:

Total public relief expenditures for the last 8 months of 1934,

Total public relief expenditures for last 6 months of 1933, $373,198,500.

Persons on relief January 1, 1935, 19,870,000.
Persons on relief January 1, 1934, including C. W. A., 15,090,000.

That shows that, notwithstanding the expenditure of funds and the authorizations allowed, we have not been able to cope with and meet the problem which has been facing us.

Next I invite attention to the fact that the relief program which has heretofore been carried on has led the Government into various fields where it should not be. From section 2 (a) of the National Industrial Recovery Act, I

To effectuate the policy of this title, the President is hereby authorized to establish such agencies

And so forth. Section 201 (a), under title II of that act. relating to public works and construction projects, reads:

To effectuate the purposes of this title, the President is hereby authorized to create a Federal Emergency Administration of Public Works, all the powers of which shall be exercised by a Federal Emergency Administrator of Public Works, and to establish such agencies * * *. The President may delegate any of his functions and powers under this title to such officers, agents, and employees as he may designate or appoint.

Following out this authority, I wish now to give a little attention to the establishment of the several corporations and the authority given those various corporations. Under the powers granted him, the President issued Executive orders setting up three corporations under the laws of the State of Delaware, as follows: The Commodity Credit Corporation, October 16, 1933, Executive Order No. 6340; the Public Works Emergency Housing Corporation, November 29, 1933, Executive Order No. 6470; and the Electric Home and Farm Authority Corporation, December 19, 1933, Executive Order No. 6514.

The date of the filing of the articles of incorporation of the Commodity Credit Corporation correspond with the date of the issuance of the Executive order. The filing of the articles of the Electric Home and Farm Authority Corporation was January 13, 1934.

The Public Works Emergency Housing Corporation's first articles were taken out October 27, 1933. Apparently there was in the minds of the incorporators some doubt, as section 2 (a) of the National Industrial Recovery Act reads in part as follows:

To effectuate the policy of this title the President is hereby authorized to establish such agencies—

And so forth. Section 201 (a), under title II of the act, which sets up the Public Works Administration, reads as follows, in part:

To effectuate the purposes of this title the President is hereby authorized to create a Federal Emergency Administration of Public Works, all the powers of which shall be exercised by a Federal Emergency Administrator of Public Works, and to establish such agencies * * *. The President may delegate any of his functions and powers under this title to such officers, agents, and employees as he may designate or appoint.

Using these powers as his authority, the President issued Executive orders setting up three corporations under the State laws of Delaware, as follows:

Section 208, under title II of the National Industrial Recovery Act, reads as follows:

To provide for aiding the redistribution of the overbalance of population in industrial centers, $25,000,000 is hereby made available to the President, to be used by him through such agencies as he may establish and under such regulations as he may make, for making loans for and otherwise aiding in the purchase of subsistence homesteads-

On July 21, 1933, the President issued Executive Order No. 6209 under the following title:

Redistribution of the overbalance of population in industrial centers by means of making loans for and otherwise aiding in the purchase of subsistence homesteads.

The order read as follows:

By virtue of the authorfty vested in me by the act of Congress entitled "An act to encourage national industrial recovery, to foster fair competition, and to provide for the construction of certain ter fair competition, and to provide for the construction of certain useful public works, and for other purposes", approved June 16, 1933 (Public, No. 67, 73d Cong.), in order to effectuate the intent and purposes of the Congress as expressed in section 208 under title II thereof. I hereby authorize the Secretary of the Interior to exercise all the powers vested in me, for the purpose of administering all the provisions of section 208 under title II, of said act, including full authority to designate and appoint such agents, to set up such boards and agencies, and to make and promulgate such regulations as he may deem necessary or desirable.

Under that authority, the Secretary of the Interior, with two of his subordinates, filed articles of incorporation of the Federal Subsistence Homesteads Corporation November 21, 1933.

It will be noted that in the above Executive order practically unlimited power is transferred by the President from himself to the Secretary of the Interior, to be in turn used by him to "set up such boards and agencies and to make and promulgate such regulations as he may deem necessary

The same unlimited authority is conferred by the President upon the incorporators of the other Delaware corporations. His Executive order authorizing the formation of the Electric Home and Farm Authority, after reciting the title of the National Industrial Recovery Act, continues:

Whereas, in order effectively and efficiently to carry out said policy of the National Industrial Recovery Act, it is expedient and essential that a corporation be organized having the powers and functions of a mortgage-loan company and such other powers and functions as may be necessary to accomplish the purposes of said

Then follows the order for the incorporation and the enumeration of the three members who shall compose the governing body. Then the Executive order continues in the following words:

The persons above named are hereby authorized and directed to cause said Corporation to be formed, with such articles or certificates of incorporation and bylaws as shall be deemed requisite and necessary, and to define the methods by which said Corporation shall conduct its business.

The Executive order authorizing the Public Works Emergency Housing Corporation contains the following language in its concluding paragraph:

(5) The Housing Corporation is authorized and empowered to take any and all such action, do any and all such things, and exer-cise any and all such powers as may be or appear necessary, suit-able, or expedient in connection with the foregoing.

The Executive order creating the Commodity Credit Corporation practically authorizes it to run the Government, insofar as any of the emergency legislation is concerned, as the following two paragraphs in the Executive order clearly

Whereas, in order to meet the said emergency and to provide the relief necessary to protect the general welfare of the people, the Congress of the United States has enacted the following acts:

- 1. The Agricultural Adjustment Act, approved May 12, 1933.
  2. The National Industrial Recovery Act, approved June 16, 1933.
  3. The Federal Emergency Relief Act of 1933, approved May 12, 1933.
- 4. Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, approved January 22, 1932.
- The Federal Farm Loan Act, approved July 17, 1916.
   The Farm Credit Act of 1933, approved June 16, 1933.
   The Emergency Relief and Construction Act of 1932, approved
- July 21, 1932.

And whereas, in order effectively and efficiently to carry out the provisions of said acts, it is expedient and necessary that a corporation be organized with such powers and functions as may be necessary to accomplish the purposes of said acts.

There has been no Executive order, insofar as the records show, authorizing the incorporation by Harry L. Hopkins, Henry Wallace, and Harold L. Ickes, in their respective official capacities, of the Federal Surplus Relief Corporation, October 4, 1933.

That gives some idea of the ramifications which the various functions of government are taking under the blanket authority that has been given to the President.

Let me suggest, further, that nowhere in any of the acts or in any of the discussions of Congress can I find the authority for setting up a corporation. The President is authorized to set up an agency; but there is a great difference between a State corporation under the laws of the State of Delaware and a Federal agency. In other words, I do not know any way in which a Delaware corporation can be defined as a Federal agency; and yet we have here numerous instances where the corporations are being set up continuously for various projects under the authority which the Executive has to establish a Federal agency.

In order that Senators may have some idea of the scope of some of these corporations, I desire to read from the certificate of incorporation of the Commodity Credit Corporation. This is a corporation established to carry out the provisions of the acts I have heretofore detailed; and here is the authority granted to this corporation:

- (b) To purchase, or otherwise acquire, to hold, or otherwise to deal in, to sell or, otherwise dispose of, any and all agricultural and/or other commodities and/or products thereof, and to loan and/or borrow money upon the same.
- (c) To enter into and to encourage farmers, producers, and others to enter into marketing plans and agreements and to cooperate in any plan which provides for reduction in the acreage or reduction in the production for market of agricultural commodities.

reduction in the production for market of agricultural commodities.

(d) To engage in any activity in connection with or involving the production, carrying, shipping, storing, exporting, warehousing, handling, preparing, manufacturing, processing, and marketing of agricultural and/or other commodities and/or products thereof.

To borrow money and to draw, make, accept, endorse, warrant, guaranty, transfer, assign, execute, and issue bonds, debentures, mortgages, promissory notes, bills of exchange, warrants, and all kinds of obligations, and nonnegotiable, negotiable, or transferable instruments without limit as to amount, and for the security of any of its obligations to convey, transfer, assign, deliver, mortgage, and/or pledge all or any part of its property or assets upon such terms and conditions as the board of directors shall authorize.

(e) Without limiting the generality of the foregoing, to borrow money for the purpose of (1) purchasing, storing, handling, and/or processing agricultural and/or other commodities and/or products thereof, or any surplus of the same, and (2) disposing of or removing the same through orderly marketing in the United States and/or elsewhere.

(f) To loan money, to buy, discount, sell, rediscount, or otherwise deal in notes, warehouse receipts, pledges, bills of lading, freight receipts, trust receipts, open accounts, mortgages, and other similar evidences of debt, or to loan money and to take notes, warehouse receipts, pledges, bills of lading, freight receipts, trust receipts, open accounts, mortgages, and other evidences of debt as collateral security therefor.

(g) To take and hold for any of its purposes, by bequest, devise, gift, purchase, lease, or otherwise, either absolutely or in trust, any property, real or personal, in the District of Columbia, any of the States, Territories, or colonies of the United States, and in foreign countries, without limitation as to amount or value; to own, operate, manage, lease, mortgage, pledge, sell, assign, and transfer, or ate, manage, lease, mortgage, pledge, sell, assign, and transfer, or otherwise dispose of, and exercise all privileges of ownership over ate, manage, lease, mortgage, pledge, sell, assign, and transfer, or otherwise dispose of, and exercise all privileges of ownership over such property and to invest and reinvest any principal, and deal with and expand its income and principal within or without the State of Delaware in such manner as in the judgment of its directors will best promote its objects and purposes.

(h) To guarantee, purchase, hold, sell, assign, transfer, mortgage, pledge, or otherwise dispose of shares of the capital stock of, or any bonds, securities, or evidences of indebtedness created by, any other corporation or corporations organized under the laws of this State or any other State, country, nation, or government, and while the owner thereof to exercise all the rights, powers, and privileges of ownership, including the right to vote thereon.

(i) To enter into, make, perform, and carry out contracts of every kind and description for any lawful purpose, without limit as to amount, with any person, firm, association, corporation, municipality, county, State, body politic, Territory, or government or colony or dependency thereof.

(j) To sell, deal in, store, handle, process, transport, deliver, and/or accept delivery of agricultural and/or other commodities and/or products thereof and/or to make contracts for the purchase or sale of the same, by itself or through subsidiaries or other agencies, or to act as agent, broker, shipper, consignee, consignor, trustee, or factor with respect thereto, and as such agent, broker, shipper, consignee, consignor, trustee, or factor, to buy, sell, deal in, hypothecate, pledge, mortgage, store, handle, process, transport, manufacture, deliver, or accept delivery of the aforesaid commodities and/or products thereof and/or to make contracts for the purchase or sale of the same on behalf of the owner thereof and to fix and collect and deduct all charges for such services.

I wonder what there is left for business to do after we get

I wonder what there is left for business to do after we get through with these ramifications.

(k) To acquire by purchase, lease, or construction, or in any other manner, storage and other physical facilities for the handling, carrying, processing, manufacturing, storing, preparing for market and marketing agricultural and/or other commodities, and/or products thereof.

This would mean that the Commodity Credit Corporation could go into the packing business; that it could go into the flour business; that it could go into the canning business; that it could go into the storage business or any type of business which its directors might happen to want to enter.

(1) To have one or more offices, to carry on all or any of its operations and business and without restriction or limit as to amount, in any of the States, Districts, Territories, or colonies of the United States, and in any and all foreign countries.

It can go over and enter business in foreign countries.

(m) In general, to have and to exercise all the powers and (m) In general, to have and to exercise all the powers and privileges conferred by the General Corporation Laws of Delaware upon corporations, and to do all and everything necessary, suitable, and proper for the accomplishment of any of the purposes or for the attainment of any of the objects or for the furtherance of any of the powers herein set forth, either alone or in association with other corporations, firms, agencies, or individuals, and to do every other act or thing lawfully incident or appurtenant to or growing out of or connected with any of the aforesaid objects, purposes, and/or powers.

Mr. President, this gives some idea of the types of business in which the Commodity Credit Corporation may engage.

I shall not recite the powers granted the Federal Subsistence Homesteads Corporation, but I desire to say that it is given very great power. In connection therewith I wish to read the list of the various corporations which have been organized in the State of Delaware for the purpose of carrying on subsistence homestead enterprises. They are as follows:

Mr. President, this gives us some idea of the ramifications wherein the money of the taxpayers can be spent. It gives us some idea of how far we have gone afield in many of these enterprises.

So far as I know, the question of organizing a corporation was never once spoken of in the debates in either the House or the Senate. So far as I know, it was never even mentioned in any of the hearings, or by any of the proponents of the legislation.

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HATCH in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. DICKINSON. I yield.

Mr. SCHALL. In House Joint Resolution 117, as it came from the House, the Senator will find paragraph after paragraph referring to corporations, which the Senate committee has cut out. It contained in subsections (a), (b), (c), and (d) of section 4 the word "corporations" or "corporation." In subsection (a) is the expression "including corporations with corporate authority only as approved by the President and within the scope of this joint resolution." In subsection (b) I find the expression "including a corporation", in subsection (c) the same, and in subsection (d) the same.

The above references have been eliminated in the measure before us, but I notice it contains an eminent domain clause which, I presume, has been substituted to take the place of the references cut out, which would still give the power to the President to pass on this eminent domain to these Delaware corporations. These corporations are organized in perpetuity, are they not, and will, if allowed to accomplish their end, show the way to centralize all property in the hands of a few and beyond Federal control?

Mr. DICKINSON. I think we should remember that most of these corporations are organized for a time running away beyond the limit of the law permitting the President to create the agencies. For instance, the law will expire next June. There is a proposal now before us, contained in the message of the President of yesterday, to extend the N. R. A. for 2 years; but most of the corporations to which I have referred are either perpetual corporations or are to run for a definite number of years, way beyond the duration of the law which would permit public officials to organize these corporations.

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President, I placed in the RECORD on February 6 documentary evidence proving that Federal corporations, chartered at various points in the United States, have been created in readiness to take the place of all business activities of the country. Five of the six corporation charters so placed in the RECORD are to be permanent, which will recall the President's message sent to the Congress immediately upon its reconvening for the regular session of the Seventy-third Congress, wherein the President asked that the 77 powers, which, according to Garet Garrett, were usurped from Congress and the judiciary and transferred to the President, should be made permanent. It seems to me that by means of these Delaware corporations he is about to realize his ambition. May I ask the Senator another question?

Mr. DICKINSON. Certainly.

Mr. SCHALL. Congress has no control over these corporations, has it? The corporations are entirely removed from any control of Congress, are they not?

Mr. DICKINSON. The only thing I could think of that Congress could do would be to withdraw the financial support by which the corporations were fed; and that is one of my objections to the pending measure.

Mr. SCHALL. I noticed that the figures the Senator gave accounted for three billion two hundred million of this four billion eight hundred and eighty million appropriation, leaving a billion six hundred million dollars unaccounted for. No doubt the President does not want to disclose that he needs this money to keep in operating condition these corporations, which are to take over the Government of the United States and run every industry, even down to raising oysters.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, there is one more phase of this program to which I wish to call attention. In the hearings before the Committee on Appropriations request was made that the Director of the Budget furnish a statement of all land purchased by the various agencies under what might be termed the "new deal." It was only a limited number of years ago that we were seeking to dispose of the public domain. The suggestion was even made that the public domain in the various States be deeded to them. Now, I find that we are reversing the policy by having many purchases of land in various States of the Union for different purposes. I find, according to the report sent us by the Acting Director of the Budget, Mr. Bell, under date of February 18, 1934, the following:

I have your letter of February 13, and regret very much that the magnitude of the task has made it impossible to furnish at an earlier date the data on land acquisitions from emergency appropriations that you requested during the hearings on House Joint Resolution 117

However, the data has now been compiled insofar as it has been possible to do so, and I am sending you herewith a copy of a letter which I am sending today to the Chairman of the Senate Committee on Appropriations transmitting the data requested.

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again? Mr. DICKINSON. I yield.

Mr. SCHALL. The Senator just stated, in response to a question from me, that the only way by which Congress would have any control over these perpetual corporations would be through appropriations. If this billion six hundred million dollars is used to set in motion these corporations, they will need no more help from Congress; they will be selfperpetuating, will they not?

Mr. DICKINSON. I am of the impression that Congress could, of course, repeal the law which permitted their incorporation, and that would automatically cancel the executive orders which created the corporations, and in that way the corporations would be compelled to liquidate. Then, of course, if we did that, we would have to organize an agency or permit some agency to be created that would liquidate the corporations and close up their affairs, and that is what Congress ought to do. Congress has no business permitting its agents to go into various phases of private endeavor and interfere with business.

We hear it asked, what is the trouble with business? The trouble with business is that the Government is doing everything, and private initiative will not go into competition with the Government in business, and therefore private industry is stagnated.

Mr. SCHALL. That is exactly the situation. I offered on February 19 an amendment which will, if adopted, preserve us and make impossible the subversion of our republican form of government to a fascistic one through this Mussolini method. The amendment is printed and is on the table.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, according to the report as to the purchases of land, I find that the Federal Emergency Relief Administration has acquired, through its activities, under authority granted it, I presume, 15,470,824 acres of land, at a cost of $68,241,133. That land is scattered in the various States, as follows:

Next, in the emergency conservation work, which is presumed to be purely an emergency matter, we find that the Government has purchased to date 7,584,296 acres at a cost of $24,101,187. I will not read the list of purchases, but will ask that they be printed in the Record.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HATCH in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DICKINSON. Reclamation (Interior) purchased 131,009 acres at a cost of $4,599,450, and I will ask that that list be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. (See table below.)

Mr. DICKINSON. Subsistence homesteads: When we debated and passed the bill providing for the Federal Emergency Relief Administration or the emergency conservation work or the reclamation work or the subsistence homesteads, I wonder who then expected that we were going into the land business?

I find that for subsistence homesteads, purchases have been made of 59,292 acres at a cost of $1,445,739. I ask that that list may be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. (See table below.)

Mr. DICKINSON. Also, the Department of Agriculture has purchased 5,819 acres at a cost of $695,396. I ask that that list be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. (See table below.)

Mr. DICKINSON. I find that building sites under the Procurement Division of the Treasury Department have cost a total of $8,580,759. No acreages are involved there, I ask to have that list of expenditures in the various States printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DICKINSON. The program I have outlined and the | various ramifications that have been entered into by the bureaus of the Government in carrying out these various laws have not met the situation. I find in the January report of the American Federation of Labor, released for publication Saturday, January 12, 1935, a graph, under which appears the following:

This graph illustrates the fact that there are 429,000 more unemployed today than last year; 11,459,000 were out of work in November 1934, 11,030,000 in November 1933.

Regardless of this record, regardless of all these ramifications and the various enterprises into which the Government make any headway in relieving unemployment. Personally, I shall vote against the pending joint resolution. I shall be glad to vote for a segregation of any amount necessary to meet the relief situation. I do not believe the work program is feasible. I am thoroughly convinced that it will not be any more effective than it has been in the past year, and that the work program is not a feasible method of relief. It has not worked in the various other countries where it has been tried.

For that reason I believe that this vast authority should be denied, that the joint resolution should be divided, that the relief items should be voted on separately, and then that has entered, it seems to me that we have not been able to we ought either to provide specific projects in connection otherwise, the joint resolution ought not to pass.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered to the committee amendment by the Senator from Nevada IMr. Mc-CARRANI.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, do I understand that no other Senator wishes to speak on the amendment?

Mr. COUZENS. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll. The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Pittman Adams Costigan Keves Couzens King La Follette Pope Radcliffe Austin Bachman Bailey Davis Dickinson Lewis Reynolds Robinson Logan Bankhead Barbour Dieterich Lonergan Russell Long McAdoo Donahey Schall Schwellenbach Bilbo Duffy Fletcher Frazier Sheppard Shipstead McCarran McGill Bone Borah George Gerry McKellar Stelwer Thomas, Utah Townsend McNary Bulkley Gibson Maloney Metcalf Minton Glass Trammell Truman Burke Gore Tydings Vandenberg Guffey Moore Byrd Hale Harrison Murphy Byrnes Van Nuys Capper Carey Murray Hastings Hatch Neely Norris Wagner Walsh Clark Nye O'Mahoney Connally Hayden Wheeler Johnson White Coolidge

I announce the absence of the Senator from Mr. LEWIS. Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] on account of official business; the absence of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. Overton] on account of illness; and the absence of the Senator from New York [Mr. Copeland] on account of illness in his

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CLARK in the chair). Eighty-eight Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

The question is on the amendment, in the nature of a substitute, proposed by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. Mc-CARRAN] to the committee amendment.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, yesterday the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. Robinson] made such a precise, and, as it seemed to me, impressive exposition of the purposes of the pending joint resolution as that it seems unnecessary, if desirable, for the chairman of the committee to make further explanation. Nevertheless, I may be permitted to occupy a short time of the Senate with some few observations concerning the joint resolution and particularly the pending amendment thereto.

The joint resolution, as was definitely stated by the Senator from Arkansas, was not intended to be a recovery measure in the sense that its purpose is directly to affect the wage scale of organized industry; it was simply intended to be a relief measure and a work-relief measure. In short, there are several million people on doles, and among them it is computed that 3,500,000 are employable; which is to say that they are people of average intelligence and capability, in good health, and are employable on such works as the Government may determine to undertake.

It is also authoritatively stated by those who have most intimately been in contact with those persons that they earnestly desire to be put to work, that they experience a sense of humiliation in being on the Government relief roll merely as mendicants, and that they could wish to give some service to the taxpayers of the country, as, in some measure, compensation for the relief which they are receiving from the Public Treasury.

I am sure it never entered the mind of the President so to administer the measure as to break down the prevailing wage scale in the organized industries of any section of the country, and I think it may well be doubted, notwithstanding the testimony to the contrary, that such a thing would result from the enactment of the joint resolution into law. It was suggested in the course of the debate yesterday that men now receiving a dole of $24 a month, on the average, with which a certain measure of relief could be afforded, or, I if put on the work relief roll might easily be induced to leave the service of the Government and take the places of persons now employed in organized industries, for which industries there are now in existence codes that deal with the minimum wage and with the maximum number of hours that might be worked. I should like to ask gentlemen who present an argument of that sort, how many of the persons now on relief roll at an average of $24 have been persuaded to get off the relief roll and to go into private industry? If none of them has been persuaded to leave a dole of $24 a month and go into competition with laborers in private industry, how many may be expected to leave a security wage of $50 a month and go into private industry?

The purpose of the pending joint resolution is to give the men on the relief roll, at an enormous expense to the taxpayers, an opportunity to recover and maintain their selfrespect and to render some service to the people who are paying the taxes which provide the dole and provide the relief.

It has been pretty generally assumed that the average wage is to be $50 a month. There is not a word in the joint resolution to that effect. The first section of the joint resolution authorizes the President of the United States to fix the compensation that is to be paid to those who may be employed under it. Under the first section of the joint resolution the President may determine for himself or through his agencies whether or not the compensation he shall fix under the measure would or would not disturb the prevailing wage in private industry. The only words said that may reflect the intention of the President in this respect were contained in what the President himself said in his message to Congress.

He said nothing about an average wage of $50 a month, but he did say that the compensation to be fixed in clearing the relief rolls of persons solely on dole should be somewhat less than the wage paid in private industry.

It is true, however, that the question of an average wage of $50 a month was brought to the attention of the Congress by spokesmen who were supposed in some degree to represent the administration. In other words, the total sum of $4,880,000,000 was reached upon the basis of a calculation that the average wage rate paid would be $50 a month. The official responsible for that suggestion also was responsible for the statement to the committee that to adopt the prevailing-rate-of-wages suggestion would involve an increase in the appropriation of practically $1,500,000,000, and raise it from $4,880,000,000 to some $6,340,000,000. Evidently that information was furnished to the President. The President has expressed himself as utterly opposed to the inevitable increase if that should be done. He is opposed to it because, like many thoughtful citizens, he has begun to consider how much further we may go in public expenditures before wrecking the credit of the Nation. Should such a thing occur, let me ask the proponents of this amendment what would happen to the laboring men, the wage earners in this country? They would be that class first of all which would feel the disastrous effects of a break-down in the public credit.

Let me discuss in a word, as discreetly as I may, the situation in that respect. The existing outstanding indebtedness of the United States is approximately $28,000,000,000. Listen, Senators: Of that amount $15,364,000,000 is piled up in the banking institutions of the country. Some of the banks have as much as 60 percent of their entire assets invested in Government securities. They are prohibited, were there the demand, from coming to the aid of business activity. They hold 55 percent of Government securities in the banks of the United States as against but 11 percent of Great Britain's indebtedness held in the banks of Great Britain-55 percent as against 11 percent.

The banks have been brought to a state in which they are literally obliged to take Treasury issues whether they want them or not.

They are compelled to take them in order to maintain the bond market of the United States, because it has been represented to me by competent authorities that a depreciation of 10 percent in Government bonds would render insolvent 90 | percent of the banks of this country.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. GLASS. I wish that I might not be interrupted until I conclude my brief statement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia declines to yield.

Mr. GLASS. I am always glad to yield to the Senator from Louisiana because he always says something interesting, whether I agree with it or not; but I am not a lawyer and I have not the facility of speech, when I am on my feet, that is possessed by Senators who are lawyers. I am proceeding now without preparation in an attempt to make an extempore explanation of the joint resolution and the particular amendment now pending.

In the situation which I have, I trust with some discretion, described to the Senate, is there any wonder that the President of the United States is intensely interested in the proposition which we have had under discussion for several days?

May he be blamed for pausing and reflecting?

True, there was a suggestion before the committee, three times reiterated, despite the denial of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER], by Mr. Green, the head of the American Federation of Labor, that the matter might be adjusted by placing in the joint resolution a provision limiting the hours of labor the $50-wage men might be employed, and that it would be competent for the President in such circumstances to have one or more shifts of those employed, and thereby employ more of the people now on the relief rolls than may be reached otherwise by the provisions of the pending measure. That, however, would, of course, mean inevitably one of two things: That there would be no difference in the aggregate amount of money expended, or that one-half of the work contemplated would be done.

I think the President of the United States realizes more than can any Senator, who is not quite so familiar with all the circumstances, that the credit of the country is here involved; and understanding that thoroughly, and being concerned about it, I think he takes a patriotic position in exhibiting the intensest opposition to what is known as the McCarran amendment. I shall say something now that I have never before said in the 15 years I have been a Member of the Senate, or in the 18 years I was a Member of the House, because ordinarily I do not believe in saying such things; but I have substantive reason to believe that if this amendment should be adopted and become a part of this joint resolution the President would veto the measure.

I have been somewhat astonished, as other Senators have, that Senators who are supposed to be intimately identified with the administration, who believe that the result of the last Presidential election was providential—which might be interpreted to mean that the President is God's vicegerent on earth—should have stood here and bitterly opposed, with words of biting scorn and denunciation approximating vituperation, a measure in which the President of the United States is so intensely interested, and which I have reason to say he regards as affecting the credit of this country.

Whenever the senior Senator from Virginia ventures to urge an objection to a Presidential message or to a Presidential measure, he is made a text in every newspaper of the country for weeks thereafter. Because I stood on the floor of the Senate and denounced as utterly dishonest and immoral the action of the Congress of the United States in repudiating the most sacred obligation that this Nation ever incurred—a thing denounced by nearly every member of the Supreme Court of the United States in their divided opinion the other day—I was arraigned as an implacable foe of the administration. But gentlemen who have flourished in the smile of the Chief Executive, and who have assumed with obvious confidence the right to speak for him here on the integrity and credit of the Government and, I suppose, still bask in the smiles and sunshine of the Executive.

I stated the other day that the President had said to some of us that this was strictly a measure for relief, to be dealt with accordingly, and that it was not his purpose or intention to permit the prevailing rate of wages in organized industry to be violently interrupted, as has been suggested. by this joint resolution. He was so unmistakably emphatic in what he said, as I recall his language, that he said he did not propose that one dollar of the wage of a man employed in private industry should be reduced under his administration for the present or that any of the relief-roll workers should be substituted in private industry except at a decent wage rate.

I was so confident that I had correctly stated the President's position that I found no necessity for repeating it; but it was suggested that I might be mistaken in what I heard. Hence today I took the precaution to communicate with the White House-the White House does not often communicate with me—and I received from the President a letter, which I shall now read and let go into the RECORD. It is as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,

Washington, February 21, 1935.

Dear Senator Glass: In response to your telephonic inquiry, I am very glad to repeat what I told you and several members of your committee last week.

Every action of the oder

Every action of the administration during the past 2 years

Every action of the administration during the past 2 years has been directed, first, to the objective of raising wage scales which, from the point of view of public interest, were set at unconscionably low levels; and, secondly, we have constantly followed the objective of preventing reductions in existing wage scales. So much for that, except that I might add that both of these objectives are constantly before us and will continue so to be. As you are aware, the practical operation of the principle of collective bargaining, plus the operation of the National Industrial Recovery Act, have in the overwhelming majority of cases of organized and unorganized labor either raised wages or prevented any reduction in wages. any reduction in wages.

I might add a parenthesis there, but I will not.

I object to and deny any assertion that the payment of wages to workers now on the relief rolls at less than the prevailing rate of wages may, under some theory, result in a lowering of wages paid by private employers. I say this because it is an obvious fact—first, that the Federal Government and every State government will act to prevent reductions; and, secondly, because public opinion throughout the country will not sustain reductions.

I have enough faith in the country to believe that practically 100 percent of employers are patriotic enough to prevent the lowering of wages. In this thought they will have the full support of the of wages. In this thought they will have the full support of the Government.

I think that the record of this administration has demonstrated that in the administering of this legislation I will not permit anything to be done that will result in lowering the wage scale of the Nation.

Very sincerely yours,

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

Mr. President, in the Committee on Appropriations, if I may properly speak of its proceedings, I held from the first that all that was needed in the pending joint resolution was the first and second provisions of it; that we were proposing to place approximately $5,000,000,000 in the hands of the President of the United States to do with as his judgment might prompt or as his fancy might please; and that if we were going to place that immense sum in the hands of the President, it must be done because of absolute confidence in his integrity and in his judgment. Therefore I did not think there was any necessity for embracing in the joint resolution these more or less controversial provisions.

I repeat, I do not see how gentlemen here who have given us an exhibition of rhetorical commendation of the President can now have so little confidence in him as not to believe what he has said to the committee and now says, through me, to the Senate, that he is not going to permit the things to be done which they apprehend, and therefore they are going to vote for the McCarran amendment.

Mr. President, I have no lack of appreciation of the earnestness and the skill, and at times the pathos, of the distinguished Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCarran] in purfloor, may denounce measures which he thinks involve the suing this matter. He has been right on the job every day and every hour of the day, and I suppose has dreamed of it at night as well as dreamed of it during the day.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption?

Mr. GLASS. I yield.

Mr. McCARRAN. I wish to say that I have also dreamed of the concluding remarks of the learned Senator from Virginia.

Mr. GLASS. I wish I were learned, and I might be induced to believe that I was learned had not the Senator from Nevada made it a habit of speaking of some other Senators as learned whom I know are not learned. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, there is little else, if anything, to be said about this matter. The whole theory of the entire joint resolution has been opposed by me from the first. I have thought and contended that every State and every civilized community in every State was competent to take care of its own indigent, as they have done since the foundation of the Government, with the subsidiary aid of the Red Cross national organization, and I have felt that every State and every civilized community in every State would have taken care of its own indigent if left to itself.

A different policy has prevailed, however. Every State and nearly every community in every State, including my own home town, has put itself in servitude to the Federal Government, has put itself under some inextricable obligation to the Federal Government to such an extent that some of the miserable little bureaucrats here in Washington have had the insolence to threaten States with withdrawal of so-called "Federal aid" unless those States would go to the extraordinary expense of summoning special sessions of their legislatures, and give these bureaucrats some more of their funds.

Federal aid! There never was such a misnomer written into the English language. Federal aid! The Federal Government has no means of getting a dollar to expend which it first does not take from the pockets of the taxpayers of the respective States. And let me tell my laboring friends that when pay day comes, when the money must be paid back, if ever it shall be paid back—and if we do not have a repetition of repudiation—they will be the first victims of a system of that sort. Into their modest homes will first stalk the grim destroyer of every man who has incurred an indebtedness which he cannot honestly meet. But that is aside. That is my own view, and it is the view of a good many people who now are indebted to the Federal Government and whose pockets will be further picked in order to discharge their indebtedness.

Mr. President, we are now to consider the pending amendment and, I trust, to vote on it, and I conclude by again giving the Senate this warning, that I have substantive reasons for the belief that if the pending amendment to the joint resolution should be incorporated in it, the measure would encounter a Presidential veto.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I desire to modify my amendment by the insertion of the proviso which I send to the desk and ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nevada proposes to modify his amendment to the amendment. The proposed modification will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 2, line 4 of the amendment, it is proposed, after the word "Columbia", to strike out the semicolon and to insert a colon and the following proviso:

Provided, however, That nothing in this section shall apply to the administration of the Civilian Conservation Corps.

Mr. McCARRAN. I desire to have that proviso considered as a part of my amendment because I do not wish anything coming out of my amendment to affect the Civilian Conservation Corps as it now exists.

Mr. COUZENS and Mr. RUSSELL addressed the Chair. The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield first to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, I was called out of the Senate Chamber a while ago, and I ask the Senator from Nevada if he put in the suggestion I made to him with respect to stabilization of the prevailing wage?

Mr. McCARRAN. I did not; but if the Senator from Michigan will offer it, I will accept it.

Mr. COUZENS. I ask to make a modification of the amendment of the Senator from Nevada, which modification the Senator from Nevada says he will accept, on page 2, line 2, after the word "nature", to insert "at the time of the approval of this resolution."

Mr. McCARRAN. I accept that modification of my amendment.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield.

Mr. RUSSELL. Am I to understand that the amendment of the Senator from Nevada provides that the prevailing wage schedule shall not apply to the Civilian Conservation Corps?

Mr. McCARRAN. That it shall not affect that organization.

Mr. RUSSELL. Does not the Senator from Nevada know that inequality between the 300,000 young men who are now in the Civilian Conservation Corps and those who might be employed would result if the amendment of the Senator from Nevada were adopted, and that, in addition to those young men, there are in the Civilian Conservation Corps 33,000 ex-service men, many of whom were stricken from the rolls with the passage of the Economy Act, and that those men would be discriminated against in favor of those who are now on relief if the amendment were to be adopted?

The point I desire to make is that the amendment of the Senator from Nevada shows the inherent vice of an amendment of this nature which would tie the President's hand in carrying on this work.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, if the Senator wishes me to answer a question, I will answer it; but I decline to yield the floor for a discussion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nevada declines to yield further.

Mr. McCARRAN. If the Senator from Georgia wishes an answer, the answer comes from his own declaration of yesterday, when he objected to this amendment because it would affect the Civilian Conservation Corps; and in order to meet that very objection I have made the modification.

Mr. RUSSELL. I do not object to an amendment of that character.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield for a question, but I will not yield for a discussion.

Mr. RUSSELL. I wish to correct the statement of the Senator that I had objected on the score mentioned. I merely used that as an illustration, if the Senator will recall, of the difficulties we would encounter in attempting here to establish a fixed scale of wages, and that injustices would result, as was pointed out by the Senator from Nevada and others; that some men would still be paid $1 for $2 worth of work, just as will be the case if the amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Nevada is adopted. The young men in the Civilian Conservation Corps, a great many of them, are now engaged in stone masonry—

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I refuse to yield further.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nevada declines to yield further.

Mr. McCARRAN. If the Senator desires to have my amendment withdrawn, let him say so now, so that the record may be made.

Mr. RUSSELL. I have no desire to undertake to direct the course of the amendment of the Senator from Nevada. Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, for 3 weeks it was the privilege of those who belonged to the Appropriations Committee of the Senate to go into this and other matters.

prudent judgment of the chairman of our committee, with all his years of experience, with all his splendor of character, with all his vast knowledge of national affairs, derived from his service in the House of Representatives in which his experience was extensive, and derived from his service in the Senate of the United States, and from his wonderful administration as Secretary of the Treasury. We had all that presented to us. He has not presented it all here, nor will I touch upon it. He has, however, made some statements on the floor, for which I am grateful to him, because I should not have considered myself permitted even to disclose the very statements he has made here upon the floor. and I am going to dwell upon only a few of those statements.

First of all, the Senator from Virginia said that the outstanding bonded indebtedness of this country is $28,000,-000,000, of which $15,000,000,000 is held by the banks of the country-I am using round numbers-and that a depreciation of 10 percent in the value of that bonded indebtedness will bring about rack and ruin to 90 percent of the banks. Then he says, "When that comes about, let me ask those of you who represent labor, into whose humble homes there will come the reaction, where will it reflect its results?

Mr. President, whence comes that which sustains the $15,000,000,000 of indebtedness held by the banks? Who pays the tax in this country? Do not the taxes of this country come from the sweat of the brow of labor? If they do not, for God's sake whence do they come? What is the origin of all industry? Can industry exist unless there is behind it the force of the toiler? We may manufacture machines until we are black in the face, but who will run the machines when we are through? There never yet was invented a machine that had the power of human mentality. Behind the $15,000,000,000 whence the banks of this country are drawing their income there stands a power that nothing short of omnipotence can break down, and that is the power of the toiler in the humble walks of life.

Oh, I have listened to the letter of the President. wonder who will challenge my loyalty to what I believe to be the upbuilding of a national institution which will continue to go forward. I do not care whether the answer comes in the form of laughter from the learned Senator from Virginia, which to my mind is unwarranted at this

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, let me say to the Senator that I was not laughing at him. If I have not the right to laugh at an amusing remark made by a colleague, then I will beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. McCARRAN. I had colleagues surrounding me, but I did not do the Senator such discourtesy.

Mr. GLASS. I was not laughing at the Senator. I was listening very carefully to what he said.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, this is a crucial moment, and I know the forces which are operating here. This is a moment when 90 percent of the people of the country are looking to this body for a verdict. When I say "90 percent" I mean that 90 percent of the people of the country are in the toiling class, and 10 percent are in the class that enjoy their income from the fruits of the toilers.

Turn down those who toil, if you will; say to the President of the United States, "You may do as you please with these people"; turn them down if you want to-perhaps we shall go on, and God grant that we shall go on. But the learned Senator from Virginia intimates that there may be a climax coming, when by reason of a reduction in the value of the outstanding bonds held by 10 percent of the people there will be a cataclysm, which will result in a destruction of our financial institutions.

I wonder if we have stopped to think what the extent of the cataclysm may be if 90 percent of the people of this country are without the opportunity to toil, and without the opportunity to hold to a wage scale which has been builded through half a century. I wish to write into this progres-

During the 3 weeks we had the benefit of the wise and | sive legislation, if it be progressive, a reverberation and a reaction from the toil of those who fought to build up the wage structure of America. I wish to have it written into this measure, and I desire the President to underwrite it. If he underwrites it, he will stand in the world's history as one of the men who dared to say that notwithstanding our surrounding sister countries have turned down the wage structure, America, facing a crisis, nevertheless, proposes to say to the toilers of America and to the toilers of the world, "We will go on. We will hold up a living scale and an American standard of living, and we will write it into the greatest appropriation measure in all the history of the world."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Nevada, as modified, in the nature of a substitute for the committee amendment.

Mr. McNARY. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DICKINSON (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY]. I do not know how he would vote, and therefore withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. KEYES (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND]. I understand if he were present he would vote "yea." If at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. DICKINSON. I have announced my pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. Barkley]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER] and vote "yea."

Mr. AUSTIN. I announce the necessary absence of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. Norbeck] and the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. Overton]. Those Senators are paired on this vote. If the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. Non-BECK] were present, he would vote "nay." If the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. Overron] were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. FRAZIER entered the Chamber and voted.

Mr. DICKINSON (after having voted in the affirmative). In view of the vote of the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. Frazier], I withdraw the transfer which I previously made to him and transfer my pair to the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mrs. Caraway] and permit my vote to stand.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I question the right of the Senator from Iowa to transfer his pair to the junior Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I was informed by the secretary of the junior Senator from Arkansas and by Mr. Biffle that she desired such a pair.

Mr. LEWIS. I announce that the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. Overton] is detained by illness, that the senior Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] is necessarily absent because of illness in his family, that the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mrs. Caraway] is detained by illness, and that the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] is necessarily detained.

I also announce that the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. Smith] is necessarily detained. I am not advised how he would vote if present.

I further announce that the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS] is detained by important departmental business. If present, he would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 44, nays 43, as follows:

So Mr. McCarran's amendment, as modified, to the amendment of the committee was agreed to, as follows:

SEC. 6. The President is authorized to prescribe, and shall give full publicity to, rules and regulations necessary to carry out the purpose of this joint resolution: Provided, however, That (a) such rules and regulations shall stipulate that the rates of wages paid to all laborers and mechanics employed by any contractor or subcontractor or by the public officer in charge for the United States or for the District of Columbia, for work done under this joint resolution, whether by contract or otherwise, involving the expenditure of any money appropriated by the resolution, need not be uniform throughout the United States but shall not be less than the prevailing rates of wages paid for work of a similar nature at the time of the approval of this resolution in the city, town, village, or other civil division of the State in which the work is located, or in the District of Columbia: Provided, however, That nothing in this section shall apply to the administration of the Civilian Conservation Corps; (b) rules and regulations prescribed under this section shall not abrogate any existing law. The President is authorized to prescribe, and shall give

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will state the next amendment of the committee.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 8, after line 7, it is proposed to insert the following:

SEC. 7. Wherever practicable in the carrying out of the provisions of this joint resolution, full advantage shall be taken of the facilities of private enterprise.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, section 7 seems to be a committee amendment, and I should like to have the author of the amendment advise me just what it means. The term "full advantage" is a rather all-inclusive term, and I should like to know what it means.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I cannot explain it any more than it explains itself. It is the plainest English I have ever seen written.

Mr. BONE. The Senator from Virginia has the advantage of having a more acute intellect than most of us; but I do think the term "full advantage", when used in connection with private business enterprise in the joint resolution, deserves some explanation because it will be too late to explain it after the measure shall be in operation.

Mr. GLASS. I am perfectly sincere in saying to the Senator that I do not know anything more about it than what it says.

Mr. BONE. Then, I am at a loss to know why the committee put that language in the joint resolution.

Mr. GLASS. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCarran] may be able to explain it to the Senator.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I shall be glad to answer the question of the Senator from Washington if he will repeat it. I am very sorry, but in the confusion I could not hear the Senator's question.

Mr. BONE. As I understood, the Senator from Virginia assumed to answer the question by telling me that if I did not know and the rest of us did not know what the language meant, he could not further enlighten us.

Mr. McCARRAN. Will the Senator kindly repeat the question.

Mr. BONE. I am asking what the peculiar language in section 7 means. What does it imply when it says that "full advantage shall be taken of the facilities of private enterprise "? That is rather all-inclusive language, and I should like to know whether it means to exclude any use of public facilities, or what it means; and if it does not have any clear meaning, why is the language in the joint resolution?

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, the language of the section, as I now recall it, without having the joint resolution before me, is that, wherever practicable, full advantage shall be taken of private enterprise.

This amendment was suggested by those who had been engaged in the contracting business throughout the country. They feared that perchance the contractors, who have $1,600,000,000 invested in various lines of employment, might be entirely left out; so they sought a general amendment, which I offered in the committee, and it was adopted to the extent and in the language stated, that, wherever practicable, the facilities of private enterprise should be resorted That simply means, as in the building of highways throughout the country today, we have highway-construction engineers or highway-construction groups, with their equipment, all ready to go to work, that, if the President wishes, and thinks it practicable, he may call upon them so far as their facilities permit.

That is the object of the amendment. I was not the author of it, but I did sponsor it, and I sponsor it now, in furtherance of giving to the contractors of the country an opportunity to employ labor they have carried, during the hours of depression, many of them keeping their equipment and labor contingent, on at a terrific loss. Wherever it is practicable, the amendment provides that their facilities shall be utilized.

That is the explanation of the amendment. If the Senator has any further questions, I shall be glad to answer them. I again apologize to the Senator. I was not giving attention to his question, and I am very sorry.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, the Senator from Nevada owes me no apology. There was a great deal of confusion in the Chamber when I asked the question. I can understand why everyone would be confused; but I know that these words have meaning, and that some interpretation is going to be given them by those who will construe the joint resolution, especially by those in Washington, D. C., who are going to disburse this money.

Mr. McCARRAN. That is true.

Mr. BONE. I want to be absolutely certain that these words are not misinterpreted to the disadvantage of my State or any other State.

Mr. McCARRAN. That is the object and purpose, and that is the whole idea behind the amendment.

Mr. BONE. These words may be construed absolutely to prohibit force-account work wherever it is possible to let contracts. Is that the Senator's intention?

Mr. McCARRAN. That is the object.

Mr. GLASS. No; wherever it is practicable.

Mr. McCARRAN. Wherever practicable. Mr. BONE. Very well, so long as we understand that. We desire to know what we are doing when we vote "yes" or "no."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment known as "section 7."

The amendment was agreed to.

POSTMASTER GENERAL FARLEY

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I send to the desk a little clipping from the State of Texas and ask that it may be read aloud by the clerk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the article will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

[From the Washington Evening Star, Feb. 20, 1935] FARLEY CONFIDENCE VOTE IS REJECTED BY TEXAS SENATORS By the Associated Press

Austin, Tex., February 20.-The wholly Democratic Texas Senate AUSTIN, TEX., February 20.—The wholly Democratic Texas Senate refused today to vote on a resolution expressing confidence in Postmaster General James A. Farley and deploring a proposed United States Senate investigation of his office.

It was shunted to a committee, 20 to 7, after sharp remarks about both Farley and Senator Huer Long, of Louisiana.

"By reason of the source of such charges", the resolution said. "the people of this great State have little faith in them."

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, in this general effort to call on Democratic legislatures to approve Mr. Farley I must express surprise and gratification that any legislature, being assailed with constant offers of patronage and enormous funds to control sentiment, even momentarily would have shown such spirit as the Texas Legislature showed yesterday. I cannot help adding my voice of commendation for the present position of that State legislature. It is rather gratifying.

The Democrats of this country—and I am a Democrat, still voting with the platform, as my vote a few moments ago proved—are looking for this man to be investigated. He is sending word around here, through the back door and the front door, that he has some intelligence men coming in here to prefer some charges if this, that, and the other be not done.

Mr. President, he is not frightening anybody. I have dealt with clean and bad crooks in my life, both kinds. We are used to this kind of a fence buster. We have seen his stripe too many times—just a common, ordinary, unscrupulous crook, with no defense whatever to be made for him.

If anybody doubts the words I uttered just a moment ago, all he has to do is to read the little article in the New Republic for February 20, 1935, entitled "Mr. Farley's Stamp Act."

I do not believe there is any Member of the Senate who understands the business of stamp collecting. The United States Government reaps a large amount of money, which is almost gratis money, by printing so-called "special occasion" stamps. There are a large number of people who buy such special stamps. The Government will print a Columbus Day stamp, it will print a Pilgrims stamp. It printed a stamp commemorating the life of Pulaski. The United States Treasury prints those stamps because of their souvenir value, and reaps returns running into the millions of dollars from them, which money goes into the Federal Treasury. That is done all the time.

This individual had printed a bunch of stamps, the returns from them not to go into the Treasury of the United States, but to go into his own pockets and into the pockets of his friends. He might just as well have reached into the till of the United States Treasury and taken that much money out of it as to have had those stamps printed for souvenir purposes and put them out in that manner.

Mr. President, I ask that the Senate permit me to print about a two-page article which appears in the New Republic. I will not take the time of the Senate from its business today, but I send to the desk this magazine and ask to have incorporated at the conclusion of my remarks the article beginning on page 39 headed "Mr. Farley's Stamp Act."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

(See exhibit A.)

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I have been supplied a copy of the speech Mr. Farley has handed out which he is going to make tomorrow night. [Laughter.]

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the Chair call the attention of the occupants of the galleries to the rule of the Senate; and this admonition must be heeded. We are not going to have a farcical performance in the Senate if the present occupant of the Chair can prevent it. The occupants of the galleries are the guests of the Senate. If they cannot refrain from audible laughter, the Chair will ask them kindly to retire from the galleries.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, this speech to be delivered tomorrow night by the Postmaster General—to all those who want to hear him—is entitled "Problems of the President." This "bird" is going to make a speech on the problems of Mr. Roosevelt. He is going to assume a new role—not a new role, but a new name for an old role. He is not exactly like Louis XIV, who gave utterance to that French sentiment, "L'Etat, c'est moi"—"I am the state." I am trying to give both the "Cajun" and the French pronunciations, because down in my section we really speak French. These fellows who have learned it out of a book do not think I know how to pronounce it, and I have to give them the pronunciation we use down there.

He does not say "I am the state." He does not say "I am the President." He is going to tell just what he has the President doing and what he has to tell him to do—taking a little time off.

This Presidential boss-

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the Senator apparently is about to read a speech which, I take it, was submitted to the press for purposes of release. It is customary here, as everyone knows, to give out memoranda pertaining to speeches, subject to release when the speeches are delivered. I cannot conceive that the Postmaster General, in view of the relationship that is known to exist between him and the Senator from Louisiana, would supply the Senator from Louisiana with an advance copy of his speech, to be delivered in the Senate before the speech is delivered by Mr. Farley himself.

I merely wish to point out that it is, in my judgment, unfair to procure a copy of a speech as delivered for release and to publish it in advance of its delivery. I do not care what the speech contains. This involves a question of fair dealing.

There is not a man who sits in the press gallery who does not understand fully what I am saying. There is no one who receives a speech subject to release who does not understand that it is dishonorable to publish it in advance of the time fixed by the author of the speech.

I suggest to the Senator from Louisiana-

Mr. LONG. Just a moment-

Mr. ROBINSON. That he consider the propriety of his course.

Mr. LONG. I am doing so.

Mr. ROBINSON. I realize that I have no power to control his action, but I do not believe that the Senator from Louisiana would wish to procure a copy of any man's speech 24 hours or 36 hours in advance of the time the gentleman intended to deliver it—the individual to whom the Senator referred—and deliver it himself.

Mr. LONG. The facts are, Mr. President, that this has been very improperly printed by the said Farley, and that my friend from Arkansas does not know the Democratic discipline as I do. He is not in the high councils of the Democratic Party, and I am. This thing has been printed by the Democratic National Committee, of which I am a member in good standing. [Laughter.]

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the Senator evidently does not grasp the significance of my suggestion.

Mr. LONG. Yes; I do.

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not care by whom it was printed; until it is released, it ought not to be published.

Mr. LONG. It has been released to me, though.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator may take that view of it-

Mr. LONG. Yes; I take that view. I take the view that he has not any more right using my money than I have using his money. He has gone up there and he is just using this in an effort to keep himself in office and defend himself.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? Mr. LONG. I yield. I am glad the Senator asked me to ield.

Mr. ROBINSON. There is no relevancy in the reference to use of money. The point I am making is that this is a confidential document until it is released under the rules which everyone who is accustomed to dealing in publicity knows to prevail.

Mr. LONG. I hope I am going to prevent this thing from being said tomorrow night. I am acting for the party. I am acting in defense of the party. I do not get this as a newspaperman. I get this because of my peculiar contact with the Democratic Party, my paying contact. I am on the putting-up end and not on the receiving end of the party.

The Bible says, "It is more blessed to give than to receive", and I still am on the blessed end of this business.

There is always somebody on the receiving end who thinks I am unethical. The only man who thinks what I do is unethical is on the receiving end. I will swap ends with him | leries. If such manifestations continue, the galleries will be any time he wants to swap, and I will not complain about his conduct.

I put up that money for the Democratic Party; I mean I shelled out the coin and got others to shell out the coin. Now, Mr. Farley, when he finds himself face to face with what he cannot answer, goes up to the Democratic National Committee headquarters. He has got himself a bureau of publicity, and proposes to use my money with which to answer me. Here is his answer. He says:

Each election is a prelude to the next one, and nearly always it is the President who is the target of most of the firing. This is true even when the batteries are, for reasons of expediency, directed at the President's Cabinet, or those to whom are intrusted important duties under him.

In other words, he says the fire is directed at Jim Farley now because the fire is really being directed at the President. I say it is an improper use of the Democratic facilities to send this speech out through the channels of the party, and to use the money of this party, the money that I helped to raise and money that I put up for an organization of which I am a member in good standing. It is improper for him to shield himself on the ground that there is an attack made on the party and on the President, and that all that is said about him would be said about the President, and that the shafts are directed at him.

I did not say a word about Farley giving the President of the United States some of those stamps. I did not even mention the business. I do not know what the stamp business is, and I do not know what the President knows about it, so far as that matter is concerned. I think, however, if he had handed me those stamps, that perhaps I would not have known any better, and that I would have said to him. "Where did you get these stamps? Take back these stamps." I do not know whether I would have done that or not. This article says, and the newspapers say, that when he had these stamps printed he had printed for himself three sets, and had printed for his friends a set or two apiece. I myself do not believe, and I will not be led to believe that the attacks on him because of the things he has done are reflections upon the President of the United States.

Now he comes out undertaking to use the Democratic Party. He has gone to the Legislature of Texas and asked them to defend the Democratic Party, and that means to express confidence in Farley. He has gone to the Democratic National Committee, and he has issued this answer and sent it Nation-wide. He has already mailed out all over the country to the important members in the party, and to the newspapers, the speech he is going to deliver, so that all the party organs will have this speech to hand out to their local newspapers to see that it is published immediately upon his delivering it. He wants to use us as a means to get publicity for this document which he has caused to be sent out to so many of us. He wants to use the party to pay for this kind of publicity; and through the official organ of the party he is sending out the statement that the attacks leveled against him now are really attacks on the President.

Is that what the party is going to be used for? Is that the kind of use he is going to be permitted to make of the party? Are the Democratic Party and the President of the United States to have themselves put in the position where Farley will stand as a defender of the faith, as the rampart and the bulwark and the protection in front of the party and in front of the President? Does he think we are going to help him to get this speech published? If he does, I want to say he is badly mistaken. I have no intention of helping him get it published anywhere—not a word of it, not a line of it.

I will read that clause again. Mr. President, I beg the pardon of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] if I am disturbing him. I will wait until conversation is concluded. I do not want to disturb the Senator. I can take plenty of time; but I disturb myself by listening, because I get more interested in what he says than in what I am saying myself.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair admonishes those in the galleries that they are here through the courtesy of the Senate as guests of the Senate, and no manifestations of approval or disapproval must be made by those in the gal-cleared.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I did not hear any disturbance in the galleries.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator perhaps may be deaf. The Chair is not responsible for that

Mr. LONG. I understand that. I was only trying to get Senators to desist from talking. I was simply calling attention to the noise on the floor of the Senate. However, the Chair is probably right. Perhaps I did not have my left ear turned that way. What I heard, I heard in my right ear. I always sleep on my right ear so that I can hear out of the left.

Mr. Farley says in his speech:

Each election is a prelude to the next one-

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I wish to inform the Senator from Louisiana that he was not the subject of discussion.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I know that. If the Senator from Louisiana had been the subject of discussion, the discussion would have been complimentary, I know. I thank the Senator for giving me his attention. The Senator and I are good friends, and I hope we shall stay good friends for a long time. I cannot agree with the Senator on some of the positions he takes, but he is going to come back and be right on some of these days, after all these things are over.

Each election-

Says Brother Farley-

is a prelude to the next one, and nearly always it is the Presiwho is the target of most of the firing. This is true

In other words, this is true, he says, now; the President is the target-

This is true even when the batteries are for reasons of expediency directed at the President's Cabinet or those to whom are intrusted important duties under him.

I am not going to disclose any more of this speech than is necessary for the good of the party. As a member of the party I wish to give this speech to my friend from Arkansas. and ask him to take it to the President of the United States and ask him if he wants Mr. Farley to hand out this speech on the problems of the President, and refer to attacks leveled at Mr. Farley as attacks leveled against the President. I protest against his delivering this speech. That is why I am rising here now. I do not want to have the harm done and the stable door locked when it is too late and the horse is

I offer this address to the Senator from Arkansas, and I ask him, as my friend and as the friend of the President and as the friend of the party, to take this speech over to the White House and find out if this man has a right to deliver this kind of a speech under the title of "Problems of the President." I want that found out.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator from Arkansas has been called to the telephone. He will be back shortly.

Mr. LONG. Well, I do not want to take the time of the Senate. I am simply going to leave this speech on the desk of the Senator from Arkansas, and if he does not want it, I do not want it. I will hand it to the Official Reporter.

Mr. McKELLAR. He will not publish it anyway.

Mr. LONG. I will ask the Official Reporter to give it to the Senator from Arkansas, and, if he does not want it, to send it back to me. I am taking action now. I have seen too many things happen to our party. Silence can injure our party. I have seen too many things happen. I am going to stand by the Democrats of Texas and the Democrats of Louisiana. Oh, I do not know; they may send some airplanes down there to see those boys and tell them they made a mistake; that they ought to pass a resolution tomorrow. I understand Mr. Farley can get airplanes pretty cheaply, and get a hat to boot for riding in one of them; so I am not going to make any particular example of them.

I am going to put this matter up to the President of the United States, however. He knows about it now, before the speech is delivered. I have not waited until it is delivered to complain about it. I am sending this speech over to him now so that James Aloysius Farley is going over tomorrow night to make a speech about him, stating what he does and what he does not do, and how he does it; stating that the attacks leveled at Farley were attacks on the President.

I want the President to know, in connection with these statements, that Farley has seven holding companies holding the stock of various and sundry corporations engaged in selling material on United States Government projects; that Farley says to charge him with that is an attack on the President.

I want him to know they have been weighing down for funds on employees and on people convicted of crime; that that has been laid right at the door of James Aloysius Farley; and that he is saying in his speech that that is an attack on the President of the United States.

I want it to be known, as I have shown here, that $52,-000,000 was to be loaned by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, and that James Aloysius Farley called up a man interested in that loan to give him to understand how it had to do with electing a United States Senator; and that now, when that is brought into the front door where Farley cannot dodge it, he hides himself by saying, "I am only here defending the President. This is a shaft which is sought to be directed at the President." He might as well have said that Mr. Roosevelt would have done it himself if he had not done it, as to make that kind of statement. He might as well have said, according to what I have produced in this speech that he is going to deliver, that he was carrying out the orders of the President of the United States. I submit that he might just as well say, and that the speech in effect does say, that the President of the United States is being held clear in order that he, "Big Jim", may absorb this charge of filth and corruption which otherwise would have to go to the President.

Oh, no! All this effort is made to shield Farley. He has not yet come into the Senate Chamber, though he has a right to the floor, I understand, like any other Cabinet member. I do not know definitely about the rule. Of course I should not object to his having the right until he is kicked out of the Cabinet, and he is going out just as sure as 2 and 2 make 4. He is on the way out. He is just as surely on his way out as that we have a Pennsylvania Avenue here in Washington. He does not dare to face this investigation. He knows that he cannot stand up under it. The evidence is here, and I want to state that what I shall show within the next few days in the United States Senate, if this investigation is ordered, will rock this old Capitol from center to circumference, and people will wonder if there is any such thing as government left with

I have not shot from taw yet. No, Mr. President; I have not shot from taw yet. We are going to give them a trip from Dan to Beersheba. Senators are going to be surprised. The letter written to Farley from Kansas City and which I read, is not a starter compared to something else and some other things. I am going to show the two Senators from Tennessee things they have not heard of that happened in Tennessee right around the capitol of the State of Tennessee. I am going to show something they never heard of before if this investigation proceeds. But, no; they want to pass a lot of resolutions. The legislators in Texas, who do not know anything about it except, perhaps, what they may read in the newspapers, are being asked to pass resolutions.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. Is the Senator going to have me examined, too?

Mr. LONG. Oh, no.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am thankful the Senator is not going to have me examined.

Mr. LONG. Oh, no. The Senator has been trying to get himself examined here. Ever since I have been trying to get Farley examined the Senator insists on trying himself. I do not want to do that.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have the greatest interest in Tennessee. Tennessee has been kinder to me than perhaps it has ever been to any other man, living or dead. When the Senator tells me he is going to have something brought out that will stir Tennessee from center to circumference, I wonder what it is. The Senator will excuse me if I express the greatest interest.

Mr. LONG. I will tell the Senator what it is. I did not say it would stir Tennessee. I said I would stir the Capitol here from center to circumference with some facts I have developed about what happened in Tennessee. I am going to tell the Senator what it is in just a minute. Let the Senator remain in his seat until I reach it and see if I do not get the whole thing told.

Let me preface my reply to my friend from Tennessee by saying that I once lived in Tennessee. I once was a resident and citizen of Tennessee. I married in Tennessee. I traveled the State of Tennessee. I have relatives and friends in Tennessee. I was in Tennessee a while back and was treated very kindly. When I was up there I paid my friend a compliment. It might have hurt him a little bit. I was surprised that they got as many votes as they did against him. It was not my compliment, I hope, that did it.

Mr. McKELLAR. Notwithstanding the Senator's compliment, I received the largest majority I have ever received in my life. I am not complaining about that at all. I hope the Senator will come to Tennessee again. We will always be courteous to the Senator.

Mr. LONG. All right. Now I am going to tell what was done in Tennessee. Some transactions were had affecting some of the banks down there. So many violations of the law were found that instead of using red ink to show where the violations were, they used blank spaces so it could be shown there was something else besides violations of the law. They had those things up and the orders were out to indict the violators. Then Farley got on the job. Farley came on the scene. They dispatched a man to Nashville, Tenn. Reports had been made by two separate agencies connected with the United States Government showing 4,000 violations, so Farley got on the scene. I have been given the facts upon which the reports were based.

A gentleman came to my office today and said, "I hold a big job in the United States Government. I had been out of work a long time, and I need my job. I hope you do not have to bring me into it, but rather than have this kind of fraud continue, knowing the kind of chance you are taking, I am willing to be called, and I will give up my job the day you want to call me." I have his name and address. He knows the Senator from Tennessee. The Senator from Tennessee helped to get him a job. I know my business, Mr.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think I know to what the Senator has reference in Tennessee. I want to say to the Senator from Louisiana that he has been wholly misinformed about it. There have been no such violations of the law as he states. I should think the Senator would be careful enough to ask those who might know something about it rather than undertake to listen to any Tom, Dick, and Harry who may

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? Mr. McKELLAR. Just a minute! I want to say to the Senator that these reports that he is talking about-

Mr. LONG. I did not state what they are.

Mr. McKELLAR. I know what they are. They are bank matters. I know of but one banking matter down there which has been discussed in such a way that the Senator could find it out. He is wholly mistaken in it; and if he is as badly mistaken in what he is saying about Farley as he friend from Wyoming [Mr. O'Mahoney] to hear the bell is in what he is saying about Tennessee, he is very, very ring and hear it said, "Come along; what have you got? badly mistaken.

Mr. LONG. I am not talking about Tennessee.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. LONG. Just as soon as I answer the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. What I was about to ask merely had to do with something the Senator from Tennesse said.

Mr. LONG. All right; go ahead. I will listen to the Senator

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Just an observation. I was about to ask the Senator from Tennessee if he expected the Senator from Louisiana to be careful in any of his statements.

Mr. LONG. Yes. The Senator from Louisiana will prove it now, notwithstanding what the Senator from Tennessee said. I will now take the responsibility. We will prove that, too. Yes, sir; we will prove it. I know what the Senator from Tennessee thinks we have. I happen to know something besides what I think the Senator from Tennessee knows. The Senator from Tennessee cannot dispute the photographs I have up to date, and I am not a bit worried about that last one, either.

Why should we quibble? Let us have the hearing and have a show-down. That is the way to meet this thing. Do not sit around here and hide about it. Let us just come right on out and put what we have down on the barrel head and let us see what there is to it. Let us have a show-down-

Why take all this time here? How long has it been since I introduced the resolution to have a show-down? It has been a long time, a week or so, since the resolution was introduced; and what are they doing? They are over here in Texas trying to get a resolution from the Legislature of the State of Texas. They are down here in Tennessee trying to get the Legislature of Tennessee to give them a resolution. They are over here trying to get a resolution protesting against having an investigation of James Aloysius Farley.

I hope the Senator from Tennessee knows what I am talking about; but I happen to know something besides that. I know how far they have carried these matters. I know they have served notice on every banker who is a friend of mine, or who wanted to be friendly to me, that they were about to indict him. Yes, sir; and I know how they whipped them right into line under threats of indictment; and I know how they went before the grand jury in the city of New Orleans, with $169,000 of defalcations on which one man was supposed to pay to the Government, and how, when that was brought out, they gave a member of the grand jury, who was a cousin of this man, to understand that if he stood in line and voted for indictments against everybody else his cousin might be let off. I know how they use these things. I know what I am talking about.

It reminds me of the old song, when you talk about what you know and what you do not know. The worst thing that can happen to me, if these things are not true, is to have this investigation and call upon me for the proof. The worst thing that can happen to me, and the best thing that can happen to Farley is to have this investigation, and let us have a complete fall down, if that is going to be the result, as you say it is going to be.

Let us have it. Let us have it. That is what we want. We have the evidence, I think, I believe. I have the photostats. I have them here. We are trying to get an investigation. We are trying to get an investigation. I want to repeat, we are trying to get an investigation of James Aloysius Farley. We are not trying to investigate the President of the United States. We are trying to investigate Postmaster General James Aloysius Farley. That is what we are trying to do.

When are we going to hear about this? When are we going to hear about it? When are we going to know? Why delay? Why tarry? Why quibble? Why argue? The best thing that could happen would be for my distinguished Let us see it." That is what we ought to have.

I do not understand that my friend from Wyoming is opposing this investigation. My understanding is that he is in favor of it. I do not know, but I just glean from his looks and remarks that he would be in favor of it.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. LONG. I do.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I will say to the Senator that I know of nothing that I would be willing to investigate upon the statement of the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. I see. I understand now. I mistook the Senator. He is not willing to investigate Mr. Farley on what I have produced here; so I understand the Senator.

I desire to say, Mr. President, that I have a high regard for the integrity and the honor of the Senator, and I believe he is a learned Senator, not like the people my friend from Virginia referred to a few minutes ago when the Senator from Nevada was speaking. I really have all the confidence and faith in the world in the ability and learning of the Senator from Wyoming. It is only natural that we all have certain predilections, and we worry along about some of these things as to what happened back here, and what might not have happened. Hindsight is not always better than foresight, perhaps, but it is in the usual case; and if the Senator would take as an example what has already been proven in cases of this kind I think he would be more inclined to agree with me. I have proved it in the past, and I will prove it this time, I think. That is why I am asking for an investigation.

EXHIBIT A

[From the New Republic for Feb. 20, 1935]

MR. FARLEY'S STAMP ACT

The uncanny genius of Postmaster General James A. Farley for getting into trouble has landed him in the midst of another scandal—and, of all things, a scandal about stamps. It is one of those things that only General Jim could have done. It is a bust and a things that only General Jim could have done. It is a bust and a blunder and a bonehead play—and a remarkable illustration of what happens in the average American politician's mind.

Before the days of his present eminence, when he was on the make, they used to call the General a "good guy". Being a "good guy" got him where he is. The General knew it and so, when he became head of the Government's stamp department, he decided to keep on being a "good guy". It meant votes and votes are what count at the moment and General Jim is a man of considerable ambition. So it was not unnatural for him to start being a "good guy" with stamps guy" with stamps.

ambition. So it was not unnatural for him to start being a "good guy" with stamps.

He started off producing freak sheets of stamps for President Roosevelt, a philatelist of no mean standing. Then, to carry on the good work, he had a few freak sheets printed for Mr. Howe, the President's secretary, and a few other friends. It was the business of other friends that got him into trouble. An unperforated sheet of Mother's Day stamps turned up in Norfolk, Va. Its value was estimated at around $20,000. The millions of stamp collectors in this country set up long and loud individual and collective howls. The howls were eventually heard in Washington and Representative CHARLES D. MILLARD, who apparently is one of those unreconstructed Republicans objecting to the high-handed manner of the General, announced that he would seek a congressional investigation. At the present moment, with the hounds at his heels, the General is reported to have announced that he won't do it again. Instead, to make up for his carelessness in sending small-sized fortunes to a few of his friends, he will henceforth send out sheets to a lot of people. He is still anxious, what with hoping to become Governor of New York, to continue being a "good guy"; Big Jim Farley, the man who never forgets a friend. Since Farley has occupied the chair of Postmaster General, there have been 17 commemorative stamps. The affair of the commemorative stamps is especially interesting because the public does not generally realize that the printing of these stamps is one of the most profitable businesses conducted by the Government. The basis for this handsome profit lies soleiv in the fact does not generally realize that the printing of these stamps is one of the most profitable businesses conducted by the Government. The basis for this handsome profit lies solely in the fact that from 4 to 5 million persons in this country are stamp-collecting addicts, people who snap up special issues almost as fast as they are printed, thus creating a tremendous reserve that is never used. The devotees consist of a huge group of postal employees, stamp-collecting companies and dealers, and a number of young and old collectors in this country, as well as millions outside of it. They collect for amusement or profit, but all buy the commemoratives in quantities ranging from squares of four to whole sheets, saving them several years in the hope that their value will double or treble, or at least increase much faster than would ever be the case with an equal amount of money in a bank.

Then again, to make the game more interesting, mistakes are sometimes committed by the printers—such as using a wrong shade of ink on a few hundred of an issue, a flaw in the die, or, more rarely, the inversion of the central picture—which render a stamp exceedingly valuable. Errors such as these keep collectors and dealers throughout the entire world constantly on the lookout, many of them buying hundreds of an issue, only to lay them aside. Meanwhile the Government, winking at the ease of the money-making, credits the sales to pure profit and prints another 100,000,000, which will vanish inside of 2 weeks. This is an unadulterated fact. In a first week of selling, the public will buy more than 50,000,000 commemorative stamps.

For example, take the Olympic Winter Games stamp of 1932, commonly called the Lake Placid issue. It pictured a ski-jumper in a ridiculous and clumsy posture that he would never assume intentionally. The Government's first supply of these stamps was in a ridiculous and clumsy posture that he would never assume intentionally. The Government's first supply of these stamps was very small—only 25,000,000—but they were bought up so quickly that another issue of the same number had to be rushed out.

As a rule, issues of commemoratives average from 10 to 15 millions—about two or three times the number of collectors who desire them—while a very few run into the billions. Beginning with the Columbian Exposition commemorative of 1893, these special stamps were issued on an average of once every 3 years until 1919, the year of the Victory stamp. From that time on they continued on an average of once a year until 1928, through the reign of Harry S. New as Postmaster General (1923–28). It was this final year 1928, which marked the beginning of the United States Government's realization of the profits to be gained from the sale of commemorative stamps. One was issued called the Molly Pitcher stamp, an ordinary 2-cent Washington, with the name of the revolutionary heroine merely printed across it. It was an inexpensive method of raising many hundreds of thousands of dollars from collectors, as well as proving the advisability sands of dollars from collectors, as well as proving the advisability of issuing commemorative stamps. In this same year also appeared the Battle of Monmouth, Valley Forge, and International Aeronautics Conference stamps.

The year 1929 saw the George Rogers Clark stamp, Edison stamp, Sullivan Expedition stamp, Battle of Fallen Timbers, and the Ohio River Colonization stamps, the majority of them commemorating events that few knew anything about. In 1930, the Government issued the Von Steuben and Battle of Braddock's Field stamps, the Carolina-Charleston, and the Massachusetts Bay Colony stamps, all perhaps an attempt to influence the sale of American history books.

stamps, all perhaps an attempt to influence the sale of American history books.

By 1931, the ingenious Walter F. Brown, then Postmaster General, began to run out of ideas for his new stamps. Washington bureaucrats and intelligent Congressmen ransacked the Congressional Library in a frantic endeavor to find something to commemorate. Innumerable brainstorms must have resulted before they printed 100,000,000 stamps bearing a 2-cent likeness of the Polish patriot Pulaski. Later in the year came the Red Cross issue, just to prove that the Government's heart, or someone's pocketbook, was in the right place. It represented a kneeling nurse dressed in black, and was received with much enthusiasm. Also in that year, the Yorktown Commemorative stamp was issued. The year 1932 saw the issuance of the 12 famous portrait stamps of George Washington, selling for an entire year in celebration of the Sol Bloom anniversary. Also in 1932 there appeared the Daniel Webster, William Penn, and the Olympic Games stamps. But the most astonishing of them all was the Arbor Day stamp of 1932, a picture of two children standing beside a twiglet.

The next year, 1933, saw one of the country's few beautiful stamps, the Georgia Bicentennial. Next to make its debut was the Newburgh Headquarters, of Washington, followed quickly by the Century of Progress and the Byrd Stamp, the latter printed for the mail going down to Little America. Only 10,000,000 Byrd stamps were placed on sale, and they went immediately to collectors. Another was the Graf Zeppelin 50-cent stamp for the South American flight. The price of these was $25 a sheet, and many collecting companies bought several sheets at a time. These last two, by the way, were sold only in Washington, where they could be obtained from the Government's Philatelic Agency by paying the extra mailing and registering charges.

Most famous of the special stamps was the N. R. A stamp, whose propagandism aroused much comment for two reasons: It carried

Most famous of the special stamps was the N. R. A. stamp, whose propagandism aroused much comment for two reasons: It carried not the slightest suggestion of the Blue Eagle, and the business man—or the banker—was out of step with the other three marchers and was looking in a different direction.

Then along came another amazing issue, the Kosciusko 5-cent stamp, near the end of 1933. The object of this stamp was to impress Poland once again with the honor America paid her countrymen. But back at home, dealers and officials fumed at this waste of material and another general so soon after Pulaski. It was carrying Government unoriginality too far. In the words of a famous California collector and dealer, "The entire thing is becoming nonsense. If a stamp is to be struck off for every foreign volunteer who fought in the Revolutionary War, it will take dozens of years for the hundreds of them. I think it will not be long before the Government will put a stop to this taxing of thousands of dealers throughout the country."

He was speaking for the little trader who has to buy these stamps and must hold all of them until their is a demand for them from the huge number of collectors. Then he sells at what is generally a very slight increase in value. Of course, the more common a stamp becomes, the less it is worth.

The United States Government will probably never discontinue commemorative stamps. It has no intention of losing a penny of this money that flows so smoothly into its coffers. The stamps are not only legal, but interesting, and an increasing number will make their appearance every year. United States citizens are beginning to look forward to them with interest, though it is hardly to be expected that they will stimulate travel or add an ounce to the to look forward to them with interest, though it is hardly to be expected that they will stimulate travel or add an ounce to the volume of mail. Witness the 1934 commemoratives: the Wisconsin Tercentenary, the Mother's Day stamps, supposed to help florists, railroads, telegraph companies, and so forth, the Ark and the Dove issue of Maryland, and the eight national park stamps. Now the administration lets out the news that it may change all of its stamps, commemoratives and regular issues, to landscapes.

Whenever new rulers have taken over a government postage stamps have been one of the first things to be changed. In fact, as various people have already suggested, Mr. Farley, whose head is not entirely empty, has stumbled upon a happy little system for inflation by means of the printing press. It is a kind of inflation, furthermore, that does not upset the hard-money boys. If he can just print enough stamps and sell them—or even give them away to people who will promise to sell them to other people—it will provide considerable grease for the wheels of industry. It may even be a way of pushing the country around that famous corner. Well, why not?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The nominations were confirmed.

Mr. BLACK. I ask unanimous consent that the votes by which the nominations were confirmed be reconsidered, because the statement was made on the floor of the Senate several days ago by the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAM-MELL), the Chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, that these nominations would not be acted on immediately. I do not think he desired to have them brought up today.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 21, 1935

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Heavenly Father, Thou who dost shed light upon the path of duty, be merciful to hear our prayer. We rejoice in the One of ancient days with His glory never failing. Where He is there are humility, truth, patience, pity, and love. We beseech Thee to let this cluster of flowers from the heavenly garden be united in us. May we enthrone them by kindly words, temperate speech, fineness of demeanor, and thoughtful procedure. In our civic life, in our neighborhood life, and in our business life may we always be true, tender, and gentle. Eternal God, discontent and distraction, arguments and assaults are abroad in our land. Do Thou so direct this Congress that it shall identify itself with whatever is truest in thought, purest in sentiment, and richest in wisdom, that our citizens of every section may feel the ground swell and recover from the lapses of the years. In our Redeemer's name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Horne, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a bill of the House of the following title:

H. R. 4983. An act to authorize a transfer of forest-reservation lands in Forrest and Perry Counties, Miss., to the State of Mississippi or to the War Department, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a concurrent resolution of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

HOUR OF MEETING

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourn today it adjourn until 11 o'clock tomorrow. I do that for the reason that the majority have a caucus in this room at 4 o'clock today, so that today will be a short day. On tomorrow there will be the reading of Washington's Farewell Address, and we are anxious to close this War Department appropriation bill tomorrow so that we may adjourn over Saturday.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado?

There was no objection.

CONTROL OF POTATO PRODUCTION

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to make a short statement.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, I have today introduced H. R. 6082, known as the "potato control bill."

Potatoes are more truly a national crop than any of the crops for which legislation has heretofore been sought. They are produced in 48 States and are a very large and considerable crop in 40 States.

I ask unanimous consent to insert in the Record at this point a brief analysis and summary of the measure.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WARREN. Certainly.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Is this resolution which the gentleman has introduced a compulsory or a permissive control bill?

Mr. WARREN. In brief, it places a tax on potatoes raised over and above a man's allotment. We think it is a far better bill than either the cotton or tobacco bills, and has been collaborated in by 15 Members of Congress, who helped prepare it.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Of course, that is not saying very much for the bill, but is the gentleman aware that a great many of the potato growers do not wish this regulation?

Mr. WARREN. Grower committees in approximately 30 States have unanimously endorsed this measure.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. Warren]?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

SUMMARY OF POTATO CONTROL ACT OF 1935 (H. R. 6082)

Prepared for Hon. LINDSAY C. WARREN, of North Carolina

Title I of this act provides for an amendment to section 2 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, making potatoes a basic commodity under the act, with the parity base period 1919-29, the same as tobacco.

Title II provides for a tax on the first sale of potatoes, the establishment of exemptions to growers equal to an annual sales allotment, provisions for distribution of the allotment, for collection of the tax, and for various additional features.

The bill provides for a tax on the first sale of potatoes at the rate of three-fourths of a cent per pound, with a provision that under certain findings the Secretary of Agriculture may determine and proclaim a tax at a lower rate, but not less than one-half cent per pound. The crop year is defined as the twelfth-month period commencing December 1 and ending the following November 30, but the first crop year is to commence 100 days after the effective date of the act and end November 30, 1935.

The bill provides that the Secretary of Agriculture shall 30 days

The bill provides that the Secretary of Agriculture shall, 30 days prior to the beginning of each crop year, determine the quantity of potatoes which, if sold in the United States during that crop year, will tend to establish and maintain the parity price in the period August 1919—July 1929.

The apportionment to each State, except as hereinabove im-The apportionment to each State, except as hereinabove immediately provided, shall be determined on the basis of the ratio that the annual average acreage for the 3 years in which the highest acreage of potatoes was harvested in such State in the years 1927-33, inclusive, multiplied by the average yield per acre for the 3 years that the yield of potatoes per acre for such State was highest in the years 1927-33, inclusive, multiplied by the average annual percentage of the crop produced in such State during the years 1929-33, inclusive, which was sold, is to the sum of the products of such average acresses such average yields and during the years 1929-33, inclusive, which was sold, is to the sum of the products of such average acreages, such average yields, and such percentages of sales for all States. The percentage of sales will be determined for each State. It is provided, however, that from the total sales allotment for the United States not more than 2 percent may be deducted from the total and may be used by the Secretary of Agriculture to adjust allotments between States which might otherwise be inequitable.

Allotments to individual producers within the State shall be made upon application by the producer, and may be made by the Secretary of Agriculture based upon a percentage of the average annual sales of potatoes for a fair representative period of any two or more years within the years 1929–33, inclusive. The representative base period fixed for each producer shall be uniform for producers similarly situated upon the basis for classification prescribed by the Secretary. Provision is made for making allotments to potato producers on potato farms; to potato producers operating farms different from the farms operated during the base period; and to new producers. Provision is made for excluding from allotments persons not bona fide producers of potatoes. State and county committees may be established under the direction of the Secretary of Agriculture to aid in the equitable distribution of the allotments.

Producers entitled to allotments will receive tax-exemption stamps to the amount of their allotments. All potatoes shall be sold in closed and marked containers to facilitate enforcement of the tax provisions. In establishing regulations governing packaging, due consideration is to be given to the customs of the industry. Potatoes sold in excess of the allotment shall carry tax-paid stamps evidencing payment of the tax. Collection of the tax is in the hands of the Bureau of Internal Revenue. The Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to issue regulations covering the validity of tax-exempt stamps issued in the various potato-producing areas, and also the transferability of tax-exempt stamps between individual producers. Under certain conditions, the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to provide for exemptions from the tax on potatoes used for the manufacture of byproducts and for feeding livestock.

Upon potatoes imported into the United States, the Secretary of Agriculture may establish a quota during any Upon potatoes imported into the United States, the Secretary of Upon potatoes imported into the United States, the Secretary of Agriculture may establish a quota during any crop year which shall be based upon a percentage of the average annual quantity of such potatoes imported from any country during the 1929-33 period equal to the percentage that the quantity of the annual allotment is of the annual average of the quantity of potatoes produced which were sold in the United States during the same period.

The very sold in the United States during the same period.

The administrative costs will be met out of the revenue derived from the tax imposed on the quantity sold over the sales allotment, from sums available to the Secretary of Agriculture under the Agricultural Adjustment Act, and from an appropriation of $1,000,000 provided for in this act.

Prior to the beginning of each crop year after 1935, the Secretary is directed to determine whether a majority of potato producers wish the provisions of the act to be effective during the following crop year and is directed to conduct a referendum to aid him in his findings.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. Speaker, the merits of this measure in seeking to control to some extent the production of potatoes will be considered in due course by the appropriate committee. Meanwhile Members of Congress well may consider the plight of potatoes as seemingly the "forgotten crop."

At the average farm value of the crop for the years 1919 to 1933, inclusive, potatoes rank fourth in a list including the nine original basic commodities. The figures are as follows:

Corn	$1,917,290,266
Cotton	1, 108, 043, 800
Wheat	867, 851, 666
Potatoes	347, 697, 333
Tobacco	241, 609, 533
Barley	112, 925, 333
Grain sorghums	66, 610, 533
Rice	43, 205, 333

RyePeanuts	$42,331,800 36,069,758
Flax	32, 100, 000

The foregoing figures are taken from the Year Book of Agriculture for 1934

There are now 14 commodities defined as "basic", and for 7 of these there are adjustment and processing-tax programs

In the past 2 years the price of these 14 commodities has increased from 52 percent of the pre-war level to 106 percent on January 15, 1935.

Meanwhile, in January 1935, potatoes were at 53 percent of the so-called "parity price", or exactly one-half of the figure obtained by the 14 so-called "basic commodities."

When these percentages are converted into figures the impact is terrific.

With an approximate production this past year of 350,-000,000 bushels, this means that the potato growers of America at the January price would receive $161,000,000; whereas, if potatoes had increased in price comparable with the 14 basic commodities, these same potato growers would receive $329,000,000.

The difference of $168,000,000 represents the difference bebetween ruin and recovery to the potato growers of the United States, who are to be found in every one of the fortyeight States.

It cannot be established that the agricultural program is responsible for the improved position of the 14 basic commodities, but the potato growers of the United States are utterly unable to continue longer as rugged individualists and must ask for their place in the agricultural sun if they are not to be pushed entirely off the economic map.

ADDITIONAL CADETS AT WEST POINT

Mr. STACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute with reference to a bill that I am about to introduce.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. STACK. Mr. Speaker, yesterday afternoon I listened with interest to the discussion regarding the appointment of an additional cadet to West Point. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. McSwain], Chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, said that if such a bill were introduced he would see that it received proper attention and was brought to the floor of this House. As a veteran who fought and bled for his country and who has had some sad experience with Sears-Roebuck officers, I will accommodate the chairman of that committee and introduce this bill today. I thank you. [Applause.]

LINCOLN AND THE REPUBLICAN PARTY

Mr. DARROW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a speech delivered by Senator Hastings, of Delaware, in Philadelphia on Lincoln's birthday before the Germantown Republican Club

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

There was no objection.

Mr. DARROW. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address of Hon. Daniel O. Hastings, of Delaware, delivered before the forty-fourth annual Lincoln Day banquet of the Germantown Republican Club, February 12, 1935:

This Nation under our form of Government was but two generations old at the time Abraham Lincoln saw the light of day. It is estimated that at that time there were approximately 7,000,000 inhabitants in this country.

I suppose Lincoln's parents believed that they had brought a child into a hard and cruel world, and that he would not have the opportunity which had been afforded to the successful men of that day.

Lincoln's whole life was one of struggle and hardship. In his boyhood days and as a youth, he sought to better prepare himself for the difficulties that he knew were ahead. Much of his matured life was spent in trying to solve governmental problems, until finally he was called to meet the greatest problem that had confronted us as a Nation. It is difficult to say anything new about Abraham Lincoln, and it is difficult also to tell such an old and beautiful story in an in-

It is dimedit also to tell such an old and beautiful story in an interesting and attractive way.

In many places where it has been made a custom to celebrate the birth of Lincoln, the subject of discussion has been the Republican Party. This is deemed to be exceedingly appropriate because Lincoln was the very foundation of that party, and, because what that party stands for today, and what it will do tomorrow, is of current interest to the country as a whole.

morrow, is of current interest to the country as a whole.

That Lincoln did a great job for his country at the time he lived is now admitted by all. The greatest job he did was to lead the people in saving the union, but that question is an accomplished fact and a discussion of it now is of no particular interest. The laying of a foundation, however, for a great political party which should guide the Nation for generations after is a thing of ever increasing interest as the years come and go. If we would imitate or follow the teachings of this great statesman, we must keep the party which he founded as progressive as the times demand and as conservative as safe democracy dictates.

In these days of depression and apparent darkness we must have as conservative as safe democracy dictates.

In these days of depression and apparent darkness we must have Lincoln's courage; we must marshal the common sense of the unselfish; we must sound the alarm of the great danger ahead; we must speak with the assurance that our voice will be heard; we must stir the enthusiasm and patriotism of people everywhere.

We must not be led from our course with experimental panaceas. We must realize that our responsibility goes beyond the span of our own lives and reaches into the very vitals of safe democracy for the future. We must repel every effort to manufacture a dictator's crown, however insidious the effort is to create one. We must preserve each branch of our Federal Government with the full knowledge that the failure of one branch means the destruction of the entire structure.

We must preserve our individual State rights inviolate. We

We must preserve our individual State rights inviolate. We must void taking away any of their rights, and, so far as possible, relieving them of any of their responsibilities.

With these general observations of what I believe to be good Republican doctrine, I should like, if I may, to discuss with you for a little while some of the things that have happened in the past, some that are in the process of accomplishment.

It was Lincoln who said, "To sin by silence when we should protest makes cowards of men." I hope I may have the courage tonight to speak with all frankness to this Republican gathering and to protest without fear that my words may ultimately reach and to protest without fear that my words may ultimately reach the ears of some new-deal Democrat. Whatever sins I may have to the ears of some new-deal Democrat. Whatever sins I may have to answer for in the future, and whatever cowardly acts I may be guilty of, I am determined that I shall not be guilty of the sin or the cowardice of silence when I deem it my duty to protest. I fully realize that I have already established the reputation of being a partisan. I neither deny the charge nor do I attempt to make the fact less emphatic by apology. Lincoln, too, was a Republican partisan, but his partisanship was so interwoven with patrictic motives that history through all time will praise him as the greatest of our American patriots. There has been no time since Lincoln's day when the Republican Party had a greater opportunity to perform a patriotic service than it has at this very moment. In the Senate and in the House of Representatives there is but a small Republican minority left, and in the actual casting of votes they have but little influence upon the President's legislative program, Republican minority left, and in the actual casting of votes they have but little influence upon the President's legislative program, but if they will but refuse to "sin by silence" and protest when they ought to protest, history will record them as a courageous group and ultimately their voices will be heard.

The American people have not yet lost their common sense. They cannot forever be deceived by the smothering effect of the administration's propaganda. They will not for long permit the promises of men seeking and obtaining high offices to brush such promises aside with a smile and a wave of the hand, and with no other excuse than that the conditions have changed since the promises were made. This country has for many generations been controlled by political parties. The American people have been accustomed to rely upon party platforms. For nearly 2 years I have been directing attention to the Democratic platform of 1932, and the performance under the Democratic administration for 1933 and 1934. So far as I have been able to observe, these statements of mine upon this subject have had but little or no effect. I have not, however, lost faith. I shall continue to protest, and I believe that ultimately the people of the Nation will see the importance of insisting that political promises and performance shall go hand in hand.

It is more or less common talk in conservative contents had importance of insisting that political promises and performance shall go hand in hand.

It is more or less common talk in conservative groups of business men that after all it became necessary for President Roosevelt to adopt a radical course instead of following the conservative platform, otherwise, they contend, the radicals in the country would have entirely destroyed our form of government. Some go so far as to say that in 1936 the conservative voters of the Nation will be following President Roosevelt as a conservative rather than will be following President Roosevelt as a conservative rather than take the chance of having the socialistic doctrines preached by the radicals imposed upon the country.

Assuming for the sake of argument that all of this be true, I should like to inquire, in view of the present record, who could feel sure that a conservative Democratic platform in 1936, with President Roosevelt as the candidate, would be any more certain of accomplishment than the promises made in the platform of 1932? In other words, how can you depend upon the promises made by a party or a candidate as to what they will do when they are reelected when their own record shows they paid little or no attention to such promises made in the past. No; this talk of President Roosevelt turning from the Democratic principles to a socialistic trend in order to avoid a mere radical program being forced upon him is pure political bunk. President Roosevelt has gone the road he wanted to go and where his keen political mind directed. He has surrounded himself with the kind of men that he knew would help him carry out his own ideas. He has kept Mr. Farley and enough men like him to make certain that his political organization was kept intact and was made more powerful as the years go by. This combination of idealists and practical politicians makes a wonderful combination under our democratic form of government. government.

Most conservative and thoughtful people disagree with Upton Sinclair, Dr. Townsend, Father Coughlin, and Senator Lone. But it is President Roosevelt himself who has furnished the food upon which these monstrous ideas feed. It is President Roosevelt, as well as Mrs. Roosevelt, who are constantly arraying class against class. It is the President himself who has made the so-called "underprivileged" believe that their condition is due solely to the class. It is the President himself who has made the so-called "underprivileged" believe that their condition is due solely to the fact that there is a class of people whom the President calls "overprivileged." This is in line with Senator Long's contention that the only remedy for this country is an equitable distribution of its wealth. It was Harry Hopkins, the President's own appointee, who agreed with the socialistic plan of Upton Sinclair in his program to end poverty in California. It is the President's own attack upon the monetary system of the Nation that has made Father Coughlin's plea so effective when he insists that paper money shall be issued and the outstanding bonds retired. It is the President's own program for furnishing social security to all that are in need which has led Dr. Townsend to propose his pension plan of $200 per month. So, it seems to me that it is not too much to say that the dangerous conditions now confronting us are due to the instability and unsound doctrines preached by the man holding the most powerful position of any man in the world. His position requires that he should lead, and the great respect that the American people have for the position incline them under normal circumstances to follow the road he maps out for them.

My recollection is that early under this administration the

My recollection is that early under this administration the President declared that he was approaching the problems confronting him, and proposing to direct them, in the same way that he would direct a football team. Most of us believed, at the time, that he was speaking of temporary expediency and did not refer to a permanent policy. I think all of us must now agree that the President continues to follow this plan of changing from one experiment to another and without any definite policy upon which the people of the country may depend.

It is important that all persons interested in the Republican experiment to another and without any definite policy upon which the people of the country may depend.

It is important that all persons interested in the Republican Party should realize the difficult job that confronts them. They must know that the strength of the opposition is very great. The President not only has a pleasing personality, but he has a keen political mind. He has a huge majority in the Congress that do his bidding without much protest. He has had, and will continue to have, billions of dollars of the public money at his disposal, and whether he wills it or not, it has been and will continue to be used for the advancement of the Democratic Party. The Republicans that are left in the Congress are being constantly advised how to vote upon pending measures and frequently with the assurance that a vote in a certain way will make certain future Republican success. I am not complaining about the advice thus given. There is nothing more helpful to any of us than to know what the people back home are thinking.

There are, however, some things that are rather difficult for me to understand. The bankers and the business men frequently work themselves up into a white heat because they are afraid that the Congress is going to pay out something over $2,000,000,000,000 to the soldiers 10 years before it is due. They assure us that unless we follow the courageous stand taken by President Roosevel upon this subject that there will be no chance for the Republican Patty to regain the confidence of the majority of the people of the Nation. At the same time they are practically publican Party to regain the confidence of the majority of the people of the Nation. At the same time they are practically silent and make no protest when the President demands that the Congress turn over to him $4,830,000,000 to be expended as he Confidence in the President, as the Supreme Court has recently said, does not relieve the Congress of its duty. This bill presented to the Senate by the administration is the most shocking thing that Congress has been asked to do. There is absolutely no limit to what the President might do. He might buy and operate a railroad; he might establish a daily newspaper in every congressional district in the country. He can condemn the presents of sional district in the country. He can condemn the property of individuals in order to carry out this scheme. He might engage in any kind of business in competition with the business people of the country. The only possible safeguard against any of these things is the President's own judgment.

It is admitted generally that this is a dangerous thing to do, but the other side of it, as has been pointed out by many newspapers, is that specifications involve the congressional pork-barrel system. That simply means the trading of votes in the Congress in order that each Congressman can get something for his own district. I do not agree that you have to take this as a substitute. The Congress could approve of a $4,000,000 public-works program and pass a law accordingly. The President might depend upon such a program in order to carry out his objectives. I would not, however, appropriate the money at the time the program is approved. It would be a simple matter for the President to lay before the Congress the projects for which he desired appropriations under such a program. This would not mean that the program was delayed. The Congress is in session now, and there is no reason why it should not be kept in session or called into special session to approve these projects as rapidly as the President wanted them approved. In view of these facts, how can we avoid the suspicion that is necessarily involved in this request? I repeat that, to my mind, this is a very much more serious question than paying the soldiers' bonus before it is due.

These bankers and business men who complain so much about request? I repeat that, to my mind, this is a very much more serious question than paying the soldiers' bonus before it is due. These bankers and business men who complain so much about the bonus became disgusted and in many instances abused the Republicans who last year voted to override the President's veto whereby something less than $22,000,000 was added to a fund to take care of the disabled soldier. They protest hardly at all, however, against the passage of the social-security bill, recommended by the President, and which, in my judgment, if passed in any form that is satisfactory to the administration will be a turning point in America's progress. When the Federal Government takes upon itself the important job of social security in all of its various forms, it immediately furnishes additional foot for the demagogue in politics, and under our form of government will make it difficult, if not impossible for any other than the demagogue to be elected to public office. It is estimated that in a little while there will be 20 millions of people over 65 years of age and if you adopt a Federal pension system, you will have a pension roll that will be all out of proportion to the pension rolls of the veterans of all wars. The result will be the gradual elimination of the primary duty now resting upon the States. In my judgment, it is the most important and the most dangerous piece of legislation that has ever been submitted to any Congress.

Many business men apparently do not look far enough ahead, and to protest sufficiently, to prevent the Congress from making the mistake in the first instance. They know or ought to know that the safety of this country depends very largely upon the business men and his large group of employees. The sooner they become convinced that that safety which is so important to them and to the country depends upon their taking an active political interest in National and State affairs and properly organizing to make their interests effective, the sooner they will improve that condition

Lincoln appreciated, as all thoughtful men ought to appreciate, Lincoln appreciated, as all thoughtful men ought to appreciate, that you cannot compare governmental experiments to those conducted in the ordinary laboratory. The laboratory tests are made for the purpose of finding something new, but they do not even tend to destroy that which is old. The ordinary laboratory adds to the wealth of things previously discovered; the new-deal experiments with the welfare of 120 billion people with the determination to destroy much, if not most of that, which has made this a great resting. nation.

Lincoln said:

"Before entering upon so grave a matter as the destruction of our national fabric, with all its benefits, its memories, and its homes, would it not be wise to ascertain precisely why we do it? Will you hazard so desperate a step while there is any possibility that any portions of the ills you fly from have no real existence? Will you, while the certain ills you fly to are greater than all the real ones you fly from—will you risk the commission of so fearful a mistake?"

The converged distant when all of we will misk that Lincoln.

The day is not distant when all of us will wish that Lincoln's The day is not distant when all of us will wish that Lincoln's wisdom had made its impression upon the present administration. Fearful mistakes have been made and are being made. We find the President asserting in one breath that "we must build a new order of society and economics upon the ruins of the past" and in the next admitting that the tools he uses are experiments.

Then there are those who call themselves Republicans who insist that the Republican Party is not as progressive as Lincoln was and that the Republicans themselves must join in a portion of this new-deal program.

of this new-deal program.

of this new-deal program.

So far as I am concerned, I do not propose to follow any group that believes in destroying abundance in a vain endeavor to secure the more abundant life. I shall follow no man who discards thrift and preaches that the spending spree is the only way to bring back prosperity. From my point of view, it is necessary for the true Republican to keep his feet upon the ground, to advocate the principles of thrift and opportunity; to insist upon correcting abuses that grow up under our system of government from year to year; to believe in and practice the principles set forth in our Federal Constitution. These basic principles arrayed against the deception, the ballyhoo, the bureaucracy, the spoils system, the costly experiments, the absolute waste of public money, the increase in the public debt, at the rate of four or five billion dollars a year, the use of Federal money to control elections, the control of the Congress by the Executive will constitute sufficient issues to give the people an opportunity to decide whether they want to continue the present administration or anything that is likely to approach it in the name of the Demogratic Party.

We have witnessed the election of a President on a platform promising to reduce Federal expenses by 25 percent. We have heard the candidate declare that he is in favor of such a platform. We have heard him exclaim in distressing tones that we must stop the deficit; that the Federal Government must live within its income. have heard him exclaim in distressing tones that we must stop the deficit; that the Federal Government must live within its income. We have heard him declare, since he was inaugurated, that the country was on the road to bankruptcy unless the economies recommended by him were approved. Notwithstanding all this, we have seen the Federal expenses increase by something like ten or twelve billions of dollars within the short period of 2 years, and in the last two messages of the President recommendations have been made that will add something over $700,000,000 annually to the Federal expenses, after the much-talked-of depression has passed. We have seen our Government's contracts treated as mere scraps of paper. We have seen our monetary system changing from time to time until no man dares speculate as to what the future is to behold. We see our banking system so intervoven with the Federal Treasury that a reduction of 10 percent in the price of Federal bonds would probably close nearly every national bank in the country.

We see the whole system about to be controlled by the Federal Government and thus become politically controlled. We have seen the business man and the farmer placed in strait-jackets, their liberties violated and their initiative paralyzed, with the Government entering into competition now and threatening greater competition in the future. We find labor and capital in a death struggle to see which shall control, and we find millions of people with a right to vote more interested in the amount of relief they get than in the problems confronting the Nation. Notwithstanding all of these things we are assured by the new-deal advocates that get than in the problems confronting the Nation. Notwithstanding all of these things we are assured by the new-deal advocates that the average person is about to realize the more abundant life; that this is a new era for the country, and that the future holds for us a prosperity which we have never enjoyed before.

for us a prosperity which we have never enjoyed before.

I have faith that the American people cannot much longer be deceived; that we could never have developed men like Lincoln if their families had been placed upon relief; that the great masses will see before it is too late that the manna now falling from the hands of a generous administration is not for their ultimate good; that its source will ultimately run dry, and that the man who would be prosperous and happy in this country must have sufficient initiative and energy to find his own place and make his own way. I am satisfied that this true American spirit shall ultimately prevail and that if the Republican Party keeps the faith, it will be able to do greater good and render as patriotic service in the future as it has in the past.

MEETINGS OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on the Judiciary, I ask unanimous consent that that committee may have the right to sit during the sessions of the House for the consideration of H. R. 5154, providing for the codification of all Federal regulations.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, there should be some limitation on this request.

Mr. CELLER. The request is that the committee may have permission to sit on Tuesday and Thursday of next week.

OLD-AGE SECURITY

Mr. BEITER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD on old-age security. The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. BEITER. Mr. Speaker, I am concerned, as you must be, as to the growing insecurity of the position of the aged in industry, resulting in their retirement from gainful occupations at an earlier age than formerly, but also in part to the increase year by year in the number of the aged in our population.

A summary of the report to the president of the Committee on Economic Security in regard to old-age pensions shows this: By 1940, probably 6.3 percent of the population will be 65 years old; by 1975, 10 percent, without taking into consideration a decrease of the mortality rate, which would increase the percentage.

Further items of the report disclose 700,000 people over 65 on the Federal Emergency Relief Administration relief lists at a charge of $45,000,000 a year, a group which would be first to benefit by uniform pension laws; more than 1,000,000 old people in receipt of public charity, whether or not from the Government; about 180,000 drawing some form of pension from States; a smaller number on public retirement or veterans' pensions, and about 150,000 on industrial and trade-union pensions, which cost more than a hundred million dollars annually. The average State pension last year for a citizen of 70 was $19.74 a month.

It is estimated that nearly 4,000,000 people over 65 are dependent. There are four times as many old people over 65 on relief lists, as are in receipt of old-age pensions. These aged do not belong on emergency relief lists. They should, instead, be provided for under old-age-pension laws, operating in all States. To my way of thinking many of the needy aged are not now adequately or properly cared for in this country of ours.

The almshouse is not a satisfactory method of providing relief for all classes of the needy. It is the lineal descendant of the workhouses and farms, which were first erected to care for the homeless and unemployed, and not primarily for the sick and the aged who inhabit them today.

Investigations made have shown that in some of the almshouses there is no segregation of the sick from the ablebodied or the mentally alert from the feeble-minded, or, occasionally, the insane. In many instances husband and wife are separated because no provision has been made, or can be made, for keeping them together. Institutions are necessary for certain classes of the poor and for certain of the aged, especially for the sick, but I am convinced that the city and county home should be the last resort for the care of the aged who are normal mentally and physically. In a great many instances, better care and greater comfort can be provided outside of public institutions in the individual's private home.

I believe that we must banish the fleer complex from American life and give youth assurance that age will not be destitute, by making retirement from labor compulsory at a definite age, thereby making place for youth. Extend the Federal-pension system, now applicable to such life work as service in the Army, the Navy, the Post Office Department, and so forth, to include all citizens over the above-mentioned retirement age, and finance this physical security and peace of mind by a tax upon the wages and salaries received during the years each and all of us labor.

We already possess in our Federal Government, and in our State, county, and municipal services, such as firemen and policemen, the security of a pension at a definite retirement age. If we could all enjoy such prospect of security against the future, we would be glad to contribute a small part of the income received during our working years; and the price would be cheap.

Youth would no longer be radical, for they would have nothing to be radical about.

The years of each one's laboring life would be active and carefree—active because compulsory retirement would constantly make place for others and carefree because that terrible fear of old-age penury and destitution would no longer exist.

And what of the years after retirement? Surely none of us wish to be discarded. Certainly not. The fine years to follow retirement will give time and opportunity for those many leisure occupations and activities which too often in our present high-pressure life are unattainable and out of reach except for the very few. Time to do things would be extended to every one of our retired citizens, and their daily security would be safeguarded by their pension.

Among the best and most valuable characteristics of our American democracy have been individualism and initiative. These we must not imperil nor destroy.

What has the boy graduating from school or college today to look forward to? Too often only a heart-breaking search for a job. That boy can only feel that something is wrong with our social set-up. But suppose that jobs were available active, and interesting life. No discouragement there.

Further items of the report disclose 700,000 people over in all branches of our life. What a different outlook for that on the Federal Emergency Relief Administration relief boy. He would be a useful citizen embarking upon a useful, active, and interesting life. No discouragement there.

And what of our girls? We should do everything possible to preserve the family unit in our national life. Most normal and healthy boys and girls wish to get married and settle down, yet economic conditions today come perilously near denying them the right. Not being able to get married, many girls enter business life in direct competition with men. That only increases the number of applicants for each given job. It solves neither the problem of the girl nor that of the boy. But with jobs generally available, any boy and girl so desiring, could become married, in the knowledge that there existed plenty of work for all those desiring work, and in the security that age would provide an adequate support.

And parents would be even happier. Do most of us fear chiefly for ourselves? No, we fear for our children. Under such a plan, our children's future would be secure and each would have opportunity for betterment through individual effort.

And finally age would be happy. No more the prospect of becoming a public charge or the fear of living upon the charity of relatives or friends. Rather the opportunity to live a fuller life, to study, to read, to travel, to develop oneself.

New York is one of the 27 States which have enacted legislation to provide cash relief to the aged, though not in all of these States have such laws as yet become effective. In some of them the law is not State-wide in its operation, its applications being optional in the several counties. In 13 States the burden is borne entirely by the counties or cities. Delaware administers the relief as a State function; in 6 States, including New York, the administration is a local responsibility with State supervision and State participation in the cost.

From the date of filing of the first applications in September 1930 to June 30, 1933, 116,232 applications were received by public-welfare officials, but of this number 4,654 were withdrawn or the applicant died before an investigation was made, leaving 111,573 applications for consideration. Of this number, 107,700 were investigated before July 1, 1933, and 73,331, or 68 percent, were approved, and a grant made, while 34,369 were denied. Of the total number of grants made, 11,673 have been discontinued because of the death of the recipients, and 9,163 were discontinued for other reasons. Of the 52,495 recipients in June 1933, 23,894 were in New York City where the average relief allowance was $24.60 for that month, and 28,601 were outside of New York City, where the average payment was $18.02.

The number of recipients in the entire State during each month of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, the aggregate amounts paid monthly, and the average of the individual allowances are indicated in the following table:

	Recipients	Expendi- tures for relief	Average allowance
1932	51, 690	$1, 258, 022	$24. 34
	52, 348	1, 271, 606	24. 29
	52, 985	1, 274, 481	24. 05
	53, 508	1, 282, 250	23. 96
	53, 856	1, 269, 159	23. 56
	54, 185	1, 254, 691	23. 15
January 1933 February March April May June	54, 280	1, 253, 068	23. 08
	54, 296	1, 245, 036	22. 93
	53, 153	1, 200, 994	22. 59
	52, 952	1, 153, 932	21. 79
	52, 661	1, 117, 104	21. 21
	52, 495	1, 103, 396	21. 02

The above payments aggregated $14,683,739, but this expenditure was offset in part by refunds received during the year from recipients or their estates, and from insurance, in the amount of $227,152, thus reducing the net expenditure for the period to $14,456,587.

During the 30 months in which old-age-relief payments have been made there has been comparatively little fluctuation in the monthly expenditures, notwithstanding the fact that in other types of public relief which have been affected to a greater degree by the emergency, there have been marked changes from month to month. The number of recipients has increased constantly from the beginning, but the average payment per individual has diminished gradually to a point which will probably not permit any future reduction. The number of new applications approved monthly is still in excess of the number of deaths of recipients and in all probability the cost will increase from year to year.

Not only has there been an increase in the proportion of the aged in New York State due to the reduction of the birth rate and the restriction of immigration but the actual number of people 70 years of age and over in the State is becoming larger by approximately 10,000 each year. As this increase is approximately  $2\frac{1}{2}$  percent of the total number of persons of that age in the State, it is to be expected that the number of applications for old-age relief will increase annually at least as high a rate.

In this connection the possibility of increase in the number of applications will also be affected by the economic status of the individuals. Persons now arriving at 70 years of age, whatever their experience has been in the past in the matter of unemployment and misfortune, have gone through the present, and most severe depression, which has reduced the savings of all, and entirely exhausted those of many. It may be expected therefore that even a larger proportion of the aged will be dependent than has been true heretofore.

Old age eventually results in permanent unemployment of the individual and frequently in physical or mental disability; aged dependents are therefore without further hope of lucrative employment. A forward-looking social program should include provision for these needs on an insurance basis with plans similar to those which have been in effect in England, Germany, and other countries, to cover risks of sickness, unemployment, or other exigencies. The funds from which such sickness and unemployment benefits are drawn are in general derived from payments made by the insured and the employer during the period of employment, with usually a contribution made also by the government. Old-age insurance should provide an annuity which will be available at a specified age when presumably lucrative employment will no longer be possible. Until such benefit is made available, relief measures will continue to be necessary for an increasing number of dependent aged persons.

ADJUSTED-SERVICE CERTIFICATES LEGISLATION

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I have placed on the Clerk's desk a petition to discharge the Rules Committee from further consideration of House Resolution No. 30, which would make in order on the legislative appropriation bill as an amendment what is known as the "Patman bill" (H. R. 1), which provides for immediate payment of adjusted-compensation certificates.

I hope those who are interested in the Patman bill H. R. 1, will sign this petition, and also sign his discharge petition. If we can put this Patman bill on the legislative appropriation bill it will be passed into law eventually this session, I think. This legislative appropriation bill is the one that carries congressional salaries. Thus we would not place our salaries above this pay to veterans, and would place our rights in with their rights.

I have also filed on the Clerk's desk a petition to discharge the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization from the further consideration of a bill I have introduced to stop all immigration into this country for 10 years.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman from Texas is not in order.

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly I am in order. The gentleman ought to learn the rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman from Texas is not in order in that the gentleman is arguing and not making a statement.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is overruled.

Mr. BLANTON. My friend from New York [Mr. Celler] is an able, profound lawyer, but not so good a parliamentarian.

Rumors have reached me that at a meeting of the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization yesterday the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from New York [Mr. Dickstein], attempted to take action which he thought would prevent me from filing this petition to discharge his committee from further consideration of my bill to stop immigration, but when he looks up the rules he will find that said action was futile, and in no way stopped me from filing this petition to discharge; and my discharge petition is filed, and it is now on the Clerk's desk.

Those who are in favor of stopping immigration and taking back from aliens 12,000,000 jobs that are held by foreigners and giving them to unemployed Americans so that every American will have an American job, I hope will sign this petition to discharge the committee. If enough sign the petition I guarantee that I will get this bill out of Chairman Dickstein's "death house", as he called it, and bring it to a vote in this House. It requires 218 signatures. Now is the time to come to the aid of Americans and help them get back their jobs.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Idaho?

There was no objection.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, today I have introduced a resolution to make money available for the construction of roads into isolated mining districts within the national forest boundaries. As a result of legislation passed by this Congress which devalued the gold dollar, and which has now been confirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States, we have, in effect, added $225,000,000 to the purchasing power and debt-paying power of the gold produced annually from the mines of the British Empire. The British Government is very liberal in supporting the mining industry; and our neighbor to the north, Canada, has a very liberal policy with regard to assisting the development of mine property. If, in Canada, a man has a prospect in an isolated area and develops it to the point of production and makes application to the Minister of Mines, an examination of his prospect is had and report is made; and if the development warrants it, a road is constructed into the property. Here in the United States we have vast gold-bearing areas that are yet undeveloped. We have the authority of Mr. Finch. the head of the Bureau of Mines, that we have in central Idaho one of the greatest undeveloped gold areas in the United States.

Through a short-sighted policy on the part of the Federal Government and the Forest Service, men who have these properties, in many cases, are unable to get transportation. The land is owned by the Government—it is national forest land—and to get a road built into these properties they must rely on the Forest Service.

When application is made to the forestry officials for the construction of a road to a new mining property in the national forest the miner is told that forest roads are built for forest administration and fire protection. I quote from a recent letter from an official of the Forest Service on this subject:

Under the policies heretofore governing the use of forest highway funds money has not been available primarily for the purpose of constructing reads needed by miners to develop their properties or to open up areas of assumed mineral value. * * * There are relatively large demands being made by owners of mineral properties to have the Forest Service build roads into these properties or to have the Forest Service extend roads into particular sections of the national forests where minerals in paying quantities are alleged to exist. Obviously, all these demands can be met only to the extent that the program of forest roads needed for the protection and utilization of the Government resources of the national forests may incidentally serve the purposes which the miners have in mind.

This policy on the part of the Forest Service is leaving the vast mineral resources located in these isolated areas locked up. The placers of Idaho have yielded $300,000,000 in gold. In this same area, mostly within the national forest boundaries, there are innumerable gold veins awaiting development that will produce as many millions more.

Mr. Speaker, our miners are struggling to open this country and bring forth this gold. Let our Government fulfill its responsibility assumed when this vast territory was withdrawn and set aside as a national forest.

I am today introducing a resolution, based along the lines of the Canadian law, which provides that when a man makes application for development of a mine property in an isolated area of the national forest it shall be incumbent upon the United States Geological Survey to make an examination and report; and if the report is favorable it shall be mandatory upon the Forest Service to build a road to the property.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and to include at this point a copy of the resolution I am introducing in support of the mining industry.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Idaho?

There was no objection.

The resolution is as follows:

A bill to assist and promote the development of the mineral resources located within the national forests of the United States, authorizing the construction of roads by the Secretary of Agriculture for the use of the owners or operators of mining properties, and for other purposes

Be it enacted, etc., That when an application is made to the Secretary of the Interior by any owner and/or operator of any mineral or placer claim, or group of mineral or placer claims, located within a national forest of the United States, for the construction of a road and bridges necessary for the transportation of mineral products of, or supplies for, such mineral or placer claims, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to cause an examination of said mineral or placer claims by a qualicause an examination of said mineral or placer claims by a qualified representative of the United States Geological Survey, and when it is shown to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Interior that development on a mineral or placer claim or group of claims situated within any national forest of the United States has proved the existence of mineral or ore bodies in quantity and commercial value sufficient to warrant the expenditure of public moneys for the construction of roads and bridges to facilitate the operation and development of such mineral or placer claims, the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to provide for the construcoperation and development of such mineral or placer claims, the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to provide for the construction, reconstruction, or repair of roads, trails, and bridges within the boundaries of any national forest in aid of the development and operation of such mineral claims.

SEC. 2. Any road, trail, or bridge constructed or reconstructed or repaired as provided in section 1 of this act shall be available for the use of the general public under such rules and regulations as the use of the general public, under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture.

SEC. 3. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated the sums of $1,500,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, and $1,500,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1937, to be expended for carrying out the provisions of this act.

WAR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL, 1936

Mr. PARKS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 5913) making appropriations for the military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 5913, the War Department appropriation bill, 1936, with Mr. Hill of Alabama in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, the first day this bill came on the floor for debate it was stated that all of our great generals, with the exception of two or three, had been West Pointers, and it was advocated that the number of cadets at West Point be increased so as to give an extra appointment to each congressional district. At the same time it was stated that man power is what wins war. From my own personal experience and observation in the late World War I will say you did not find any West Pointers up in the front-line trenches to amount to anything, or leading platoons and combat outfits of less than a regiment, but you found the officers leading these organizations were volunteer emergency officers; that is, civilian officers, the same as the men they were leading. Now, I have no quarrel with West Point. I think it is a great institution. I am proud of it, and I believe the training it affords is very useful and essential in training our armies, but the fact remains, nevertheless, that it was the civilians that did the actual fighting to win the war. In the World War there were 1,655 officers killed in action. Of this number only 25 were West Point graduates. There were 559 officers died of wounds received in action, with 7 of that number being West Point graduates, or only 1.5 percent of the killed in action were professional officers West Point trained and 98.5 percent were civilian officers.

While I do not believe in great standing armies and great military expenditures-they lead to war-I do believe in adequate defense and preparation. I am not a pacifist and I am not against West Point, as I have said. As a matter of fact, I believe West Point should graduate more students: more of these professional officers should man the firing lines; the percentage of casualties among the commissioned officers, instead of being 1,655 to 25, should be reversed. in proportion to the number involved. The point I am making is that those who go into the war business for the love of it are not the ones who suffer, and their names do not appear upon the casualty list. War for the most part only means one thing, and that is death and destruction, and, as was brought out in his wonderful speech here on the floor a day or two ago by Congressman Shannon, of Missouri, we do not have to look to foreign countries to discover the atrocities of war, we have plenty of examples here at home. I believe in case of war that wealth should be drafted the same as man power; I do not believe that there would be so many wars if those who agitated the war, if the war profiteers, the professional soldiers, and those who declared war, had to do the actual fighting and dying; and while I think this Congress has always been impelled by the most patriotic and loyal motives in declaring war, I feel quite sure that there would never be a war of aggression declared or a war be fought again across the seas or outside of our own boundaries if the Members of Congress, upon the declaration of war, were automatically inducted into the service as buck privates to form the front ranks of our combat units.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARPENTER. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Can the gentleman tell us the percentage of West Point officers who participated in the World War? In other words, the gentleman has given us the number of officers killed and the percentage of West Point officers killed, but can he give us the total number of West Point officers who were engaged in the World War?

Mr. CARPENTER. I have not that figure.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Without that figure the other figures are not intelligible. I hope the gentleman will furnish us this information.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed out

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut?

There was no objection.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. Mr. Chairman, we who are serving in Congress under the Roosevelt administration may well be proud of our accomplishments for the good of the Nation. Nevertheless, time is bound to prove some deficiencies in our efforts which demand changes in our work. Such a change is being demanded right now by the people of the United States with regard to subsection B of section 55 of the Revenue Act of 1934, that provision which permits the publicity of income-tax returns.

The motives underlying this publicity section while intended to give fair treatment for all taxpayers of the country lacked a foresight and wisdom in dealing with the problems which arose out of the income-tax laws.

It is almost a year since the Revenue Act of 1934 and this publicity feature were adopted. We have had all that time in which to think the matter over. The people of America have been thinking, too. Those of us who were opposed to the publicity provision when it was first inserted in the Revenue Act of 1934 today more than ever are convinced that this law is an outrage and has no place in the legislation of the Roosevelt administration.

Those who advocated this provision thought that publicity of income-tax returns would help the Government to collect the amount of taxes which were due it. If a taxpayer is going to evade paying his taxes, he is not going to be coerced into becoming an honest man simply by the publication of his income-tax statement.

What seems to have been entirely overlooked are the millions of honest, patriotic, loyal citizens who make every effort to cooperate for the effective operation of the law but who rightfully consider their income and all information pertaining to it strictly private property. They are willing to submit this information to the Government. There is no reason under the sun why they should submit it to the public.

Another most important claim that I make is that, instead of producing more revenue, publicity to income-tax returns will make for less revenue. Citizens who do not want the public to know the extent of their income will become cheats, liars, and perjurers and cut down their income figures. The result then will be the Government will lose millions of dollars which otherwise would flow naturally into the Treasury. The Internal Revenue Department will be spending millions of dollars investigating tax statements, a procedure which will cause the expenditure of more dollars to collect income taxes than will be returned to the Government as the result of such investigations.

Our mail is replete with angry protests from our constituents. It is not the ordinary lobby which has prompted the communications which we are receiving. The letters which are coming to my office, at least, are letters which show individual thought and attention. My letters come from constituents who have nothing to fear or nothing to lose if the small amount of income tax they pay is made public. Their sense of fair play is outraged.

The publicity clause of the Revenue Act of 1934 should be repealed. There is a growing sentiment in this House against this section. I am confident that the administration is not inclined favorably to it. I am confident that the Secretary of the Treasury and others associated with him are not favorably inclined to this provision.

As a step toward the ultimate repeal of this provision I am today introducing a bill to postpone for 1 year the effective date of the publicity section of the Revenue Act of 1934. At the same time I am introducing a resolution authorizing and directing the House Committee on Ways and Means to report to the House of Representatives as soon as practicable, but not later than 10 days after the adoption of this resolution. as to their findings upon investigation whether this section should be repealed.

In order to conduct such an investigation the Ways and Means Committee should hold hearings. Witnesses should be called, including the Secretary of the Treasury, tax experts, and other Government officials, as well as individual citizens. We Members of Congress will thus have a further opportunity to consider the matter. The people who have voiced their opposition to this clause and the millions who feel this opposition but have not voiced it will know that we are fairly reconsidering the matter. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

For contingent expenses of the Military Intelligence Division, General Staff Corps, and of the military attachés at the United States embassies and legations abroad, including the purchase of law books, professional books of reference, and subscriptions to newspapers and periodicals; for the hire of interpreters, special agents, and guides, and for such other purposes as the Secretary of War may deem proper, including $5,000 for the actual and necessary expenses of officers of the Army on duty abroad for the purpose of observing operations of armies of foreign states at war, to be paid upon certificates of the Secretary of War that the expenditures were necessary for obtaining military information, $46,000, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War: Provided, That section 3648, Revised Statutes (U. S. C., title 31, sec. 529), shall not apply to payments made from appropriations contained in this act in compliance with the laws of foreign countries or their ministerial regulations under which the military attachés are required to operate. which the military attachés are required to operate.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word in order to make an announcement to the Members of the House. A number of Members have spoken to me concerning construction they deem necessary in their respective districts at Army posts, fields, or forts. Of course, before there can be any construction there must be authorization; and I want to say that the War Department has made certain recommendations to the Committee on Military Affairs with regard to a large number of additional alterations, or new construction at various posts, fields, and forts. This bill has been referred to the subcommittee on Army housing, of which the distinguished Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House [Mr. Hill of Alabama] is chairman; and any Members interested in projects regarding construction in their various districts should contact the chairman of this subcommittee. This subcommittee will hold a hearing just as soon as possible. In fact, the chairman of the subcommittee held a partial hearing this morning.

Mr. BOLTON. Does it mean that no P. W. A. funds are to be used for construction in the Army?

Mr. McSWAIN. No; it does not mean that. It means, however, that if you can get a bill out of the committee and have it passed by this House, it will be an almost conclusively persuasive force upon the P. W. A. authorities to use the money there as specified in the bill rather than somewhere else.

Mr. BOLTON. It will be a definite instruction rather than an indefinite instruction?

Mr. McSWAIN. Yes. It is an effort to give direction to the activity of the P. W. A. fund.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McSWAIN. I yield to the distinguished gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BUCHANAN. The hearings before the Appropriations Committee demonstrated the fact that officers in the Army, by reason of their advanced age, are being retired to such an extent that it will leave the Army short of officers. My inquiry is, Has the gentleman's committee considered an increase of cadets at West Point?

Mr. McSWAIN. No. The committee as a whole has not considered that, because there is no bill pending before the committee.

I may say to the gentleman from Texas that a bill was introduced by his colleague the gentleman from Texas [Mr. THOMASON], which has been reported by the committee and is now upon the Union Calendar with reference to increasing the Regular Army officer personnel by, I believe, 381 in order to fill the Air Corps up to its authorized strength, and to call to extended tours of duty not to exceed 1 year at a time 2,000 Reserve officers to be used by the Regular Army, and presumably to be trained in the various service schools during this period.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I would commend to the gentleman the reading of the hearings on the subject of increasing the number of West Point cadets, as appears in the hearings of the Committee on Appropriations. We were without authority to bring in legislation.

Mr. McSWAIN. We appreciate that fact, and we will be glad to consider any bill that anyone may introduce and which may be referred to the committee.

Mr. McFARLANE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McSWAIN. I yield to the gentleman from Texas. Mr. McFARLANE. Has the gentleman's committee considered the advisability of the enactment of a personal selection bill, such as this Congress enacted for the Navy and | have an adequate defense, both on land and on sea; but we Marine Corps at the last session?

Mr. McSWAIN. No; the committee has not considered that matter. There is a bill pending before the committee. introduced by myself at the request of the War Department, which proposes to deal with the subject of promotion, but it does not in any way propose to deal with it by the selecting method.

Mr. McFARLANE. I would like to have the gentleman's committee study the way the measure has worked for the other two branches of the service and would commend to the consideration of the gentleman's committee such a bill for the Army in order to make the personnel selection of officers for the service uniform.

Mr. McSWAIN. We will be very glad indeed to consider any suggestions the gentleman may have to offer.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the

Mr. Chairman, I would feel just a little recreant to my convictions if I did not on the occasion of the consideration of this $400,000,000 War Department appropriation bill register a protest at this increased expenditure at the expense of a complete neglect of the consciousness of peace in the United States of America. You who were Members of the Seventy-third Congress will remember that on the 19th of March, 1933, we considered a joint resolution introduced by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McReynolds], conferring upon the President of the United States the authority to embargo shipments of arms to some of these countries in South America where they are now engaged in deadly shambles. I remember a recital from a report that was submitted by the committee, which said that the administration wanted the passage of that resolution in the interest of peace. So it was rather amazing to pick up the Con-GRESSIONAL RECORD of yesterday and read all the interlarding quotations from Abraham Lincoln and George Washington about adequate defense, but not to read the most important and the most salient contribution that the Father of his Country ever made to the cause.

It is recited what he said in 1796 and 1797, but why did they not quote what he said in 1790, when he said that "war, the shame of mankind, should be banished from the earth." It is very intriguing indeed to watch our gradual progress toward the building up of a great military machine and watch our retrogression from the ultimate objective of universal peace.

You who were Members of the last Congress will agree that 90 percent of our problems were the inheritances of war. When Mr. Wallace came with his Agricultural Adjustment Act, did he not say to us there had been an expansion of 53,000,000 tillable acres in this country as a result of the war?

When we voted upon the economy bill in March of 1933 and were literally deluged with letters and telegrams, it was nothing else except a record upon an inheritance of the war of 1917 and 1918. When the Budget makers at the other end of the Avenue cudgled their brain in the hope of restoring some fiscal balance in this country, it was nothing else but an inheritance of the war. If you will pardon the sentimentality, when those beloved gold-star mothers went to France at the instance of this Government some years ago and there let their bittered tears fall upon the last resting place consecrated to a beloved son, blood of their blood, it was nothing more than an inheritance of the war. So I cannot let this opportunity go by, standing as we do upon the eve of the anniversary of the birth of the Father of his Country, without making some sort of protest against the gradual and progressive aggrandizement of the military machine in this

I will be told that the existence of an adequate defense force is no inspiration for war, and I will agree. I will agree also, as a member of several patriotic organizations, including the American Legion and the Veterans of Foreign Wars; I will agree, as one of the defenders of that flag; and I will agree, as a good citizen of the United States, that we should forget the larger psychological implication of this thing.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for an additional 5 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, if we add $50,000,000 in this bill and we add other millions of dollars in bills to come in the future, and if the very genial gentlemen of the War Department succeed in wangling from the President of the United States some portion of the $4,000,000,000 for military construction and otherwise, we are ultimately going to reach a billion dollar level, and certainly that is not conducive to peace. An armed force as such is perfectly all right, and I am in accord with that sentiment; but as we do increase, what happens? Those folks on the other side of the earth in Japan, Germany, France, England, and elsewhere watch our expenditures so far as concerns our military forces, and they in turn say that they have got to build up their own defense forces.

Who, then, is going to assume the leadership in this kind of a race? If Japan watches our expenditures and increases hers year by year and then, in turn, we increase ours because we are watching Japan, there will be no end to this race of armament until you fasten a most intolerable burden upon the taxpayers of the United States of America and upon every other country under the sun. There has to be an end to it sometime, somewhere.

I, for one, would rather take that $50,000,000 and give it to the distressed and hungry people of this country instead of spending it upon any instrumentality of war.

I appreciate how futile my efforts are here. Last year I suggested at the time we were taking up the War Department appropriation bill the allocation of $50,000 out of the total fund for the establishment in the Department of State of an additional subdivision to be known as an "under secretary of peace."

At that time we were talking about appropriating for airplanes that were going to cost from $150,000 to $200,000. I was asking for 25 percent of the cost of one good bombing plane, and when I wrote to the Secretary of State, he stated in a rather long and exhaustive letter that there might be danger, on the part of the diplomats in other corners of the world, of misinterpreting such an appropriation, thinking, perhaps, that only that section of the Department of State would address itself to the problems of peace. I thought it was a rather thin and vapid kind of excuse, but it only goes to show that we are being more or less dominated day after day by those who believe we ought to build up such a great force and such large armament that, ultimately, along with this jingo psychology, it will be the inspiration for another war. Having come through the last war alive, but having seen my own comrades bleeding over in France, I will not let this come about without some kind of protest. [Applause.]

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. MAY. The gentleman spoke of certain foreign nations taking our preparation for war as an inducement for them to prepare for war. Does not the gentleman think, in view of the history of some certain foreign nations and their attitude toward adjoining neighbors, they will be less likely to provoke war with us if we are adequately prepared for war and that they will withhold their club and look us over before they attack us, if we are prepared, more than they would if we were not prepared?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Does the gentleman honestly and sincerely believe we are in danger of attack?

Mr. MAY. Does the gentleman remember Shanghai and Jehol and Manchuria about 2 years ago?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I remember from my reading of history that war is a form of political action that results from economic causes [applause], and you will find in the history of our own country that this is true.

We like to parade and give out a lot of bombastic information and knowledge and refer to high and patriotic motives with respect to the War of 1812.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Back in 1812 Congressmen on this floor said: "Is not the fur trade of the St. Lawrence and Canada worth something?" while we were heaping encomiums upon Andrew Jackson standing behind the palmetto logs and the cotton bales of the South.

In 1846 the same thing was true of Texas. We made out a most splendid case, and, as a matter of fact, there were lots of people here in the North, in my own State, and in the Halls of Congress, who held a lot of worthless bonds they wanted to see validated and made of value by having the great Lone Star Commonwealth come into the sisterhood of States. So you get right back to the economic cause.

In 1898, it seems to me, we were getting along pretty well until Antonio Maceo in Cuba began to destroy the sugar plantations. General Weyler herded the people into concentration camps, and men, women, and children began to die like flies; but when Antonio Maceo started to destroy the sugar plantations, that was when McKinley took a hand in the proceedings, and there is your economic cause once

Now, I will say to you that if we follow some kind of unsound foreign-trade idea so that we are going to get back to dollar diplomacy and have the flag and the Army follow the dollar, then we will need an army; but I protest against that sort of thing.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky. Mr. MAY. The gentleman referred in the course of his splendid address here to the fact he had seen his comrades fall on foreign soil during the war. I want to ask him if it is not a fact that one of the saddest and one of the most terrible experiences of this Government was the fact that we were compelled, by reason of our lack of preparation, to rush the youth of this country into war without any preparation whatever?

Mr. DIRKSEN. A sadder fact than that is that when you forge the weapon and put it in the hands of somebody, the slightest provocation will brook its use.

Mr. MAY. Then the gentleman would send his son to war without a weapon, without training, and without any experience whatever?

Mr. DIRKSEN. No; the gentleman forgets my first premise. I am for adequate defense, but I am against building up progressively, year by year, a dominant military machine.

Mr. MAY. I am an extreme pacifist in my continuing desire for world peace, but believing as did Washington that adequate preparation for war is the surest guarantee of peace; but may I ask, Does the gentleman know that this country stands seventeenth on the list of nations insofar as preparation for war is concerned, without regard to its great natural resources?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I will say to the gentleman I do not believe those figures amount to a tinker's whoop. They do not mean anything.

Mr. LUNDEEN. When the gentleman from Illinois referred to his own State. I am reminded of the fact that on this floor in 1846 and 1848, Abraham Lincoln, who came from the gentleman's district, voted against the Mexican War, and for 12 years thereafter was unable to gain the approval of his fellow citizens, but when he did he went into the White House.

Mr. LUCKEY. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. DIRKSEN. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LUCKEY. Is it not a fact that the United States leads in armament and has since 1913? Since that date the United States has increased its appropriations for the Army 197 percent. Through the same term Japan has increased 142 percent; England, 42 percent; France, 30 percent; Italy, 44 percent; and Russia, 30 percent. Now, in view of all this talk about not being prepared, where is the money going to?

Mr. SISSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. SISSON. The gentleman has just asked the question I was about to ask. Now, I want to say that the gentleman was referring to the military strength and not to the standing army. He is not taking into consideration that embodied in the question the gentleman asked, namely, the amount we are expending in this race.

Mr. DIRKSEN. In spite of anything that has been said before, I want to say that there were soldiers in my battery and in the companies with which I soldiered who had not been in the Army 6 weeks before they walked on a transport and they were pretty good soldiers. [Applause.]

Mr. BOLTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment. I do so largely to correct a false impression that might have been conveyed by my colleague from Illinois. The gentleman has said that we had before us the $400,000,000 War Department bill. That is correct in part, but I desire to call attention to the fact that it is for approximately $378,000,000, and of that $378,000,000, $60,-000,000 is for nonmilitary purposes. A part is for river and harbor work, in which the gentleman from Illinois is interested

Mr. DIRKSEN. Forty-nine million dollars represents an increase.

Mr. BOLTON. That is correct; but, unfortunately, the general impression given by a War Department appropriation bill is that the entire sum carried in the bill is to be used for military activities. This, of course, is not correct. The gentleman and I are both members of the American Legion, and from our experiences I do not think he has any more horror of war than I have.

But I believe the greatest asset against war is preparedness. I believe our expenditures by the War Department for the Army are the best insurance against war that we can

In that connection I want to give you some figures as to the expenditures for insurance in this country.

During the past 5 years—and I get these figures from the standard fire-insurance tables-during the last 5 years ending December 1933 we spent $4,502,992,000 for premiums for fire insurance in the United States alone. That is an average of $900,598,000 per annum. If we can afford to pay that for just one type of insurance against fire, is $318,000,000 annual expenditure for national preparedness on the part of our Army excessive? I do not think so, and I think when we compare these expenditures with other insurance expenditures we can agree that this expenditure is the best way to insure peace.

Statements have been made comparing the personnel of the United States Army with other nations of the world. I do not want to take up the time of the committee, but I do desire at this point to call attention to certain tables, comparing the strength of the United States Army with other nations of the world on the basis of per capita, wealth, and so forth, which I believe may correct certain impressions.

The principal reason for high relative costs in the Army of the United States as compared to foreign nations involves fundamental differences in principles of organization. Every foreign army of any size, except that of Great Britain, is recruited and maintained by conscription. Military service in those countries is rendered in peace as an obligation to the state, and pay involved is insignificant. As illustrations, these conscripts are paid as follows:

In France: Seven and one-half francs per month.

In Italy: Twelve lira per month.

Expressed in terms of American money, these amounts are, at normal rates of exchange:

For France: Thirty cents per month. For Italy: Sixty cents per month.

In contradiction to the conscript method of recruiting and maintaining armies, the American establishment is purely voluntary. As a consequence, pay must be sufficient to induce men of the necessary qualifications to enlist in the Army. Admittedly this system is an expensive one, but it nevertheless represents a principle in military organization that has been consistently observed in this country as a peace-time policy since the founding of our Republic. The mere fact that it entails a greater expenditure has never been considered as sufficient reason for its abandonment by the United States.

Enlistment in our Regular Army does not even carry with it an obligation to subsequent service in a reserve. This practice is followed in Great Britain, where the normal enlistment is for 12 years, a large portion of which is spent in a reserve, in which the pay is nominal only.

Another and very important reason for higher per capita costs in the United States is our national standard of living. American labor, American citizenry as a whole, enjoys a standard of living far higher than that obtaining in any other country. This is reflected in higher domestic prices for a piece of steel, a pound of powder, an airplane engine, a uniform, and for every item in the vast congeries of articles that constitute the essential supplies of the Army.

There is given below in tabulated form certain statistical data concerning comparative costs in military establishments of the world. These figures have been determined with such accuracy as was possible in the time available. I hope that they are in sufficient detail to meet the requirements of your purpose.

FIRE-INSURANCE PREMIUMS IN THE UNITED STATES

For the 5-year period ending December 1933 approximately $4,502,992,821 was paid as fire-insurance premiums in the United States.

This makes an annual average of $900,598,564. (Authority: Standard fire insurance tables.)

National defense expenditures, as compared to national wealth, for the year 1933 are as follows (Army, Navy, and Air):

	Estimated national wealth	Defense ex- penditures	Percent- age

Due to the differences in costs of the voluntary system as opposed to the conscript system, and to differences in living standards, it is extremely difficult to base any accurate comparisons on budgetary considerations. The following tables make military comparisons on a somewhat different basis:

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words.

Mr. Chairman, I wanted the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] to yield, but he did not have time, so I will take advantage of this opportunity and make my statement. Every Congressman in the United States knows there are thousands of men and women losing their homes. In Pittsburgh there are many people parking right at the office of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation. They want the Government to do something to save their homes. It seems to me if we would appropriate a little more money to save the homes of the people of the United States instead of appropriating money to destroy human life, it would be a much more humane act. Much time is being consumed in talking about battleships and munitions of war. When we hear the words "battleships" and "munitions of war" we know it is humanity that is going to be slaughtered. I do not hesitate to say that it is our duty to provide funds for the American people who are out of work and who cannot pay their rent and who cannot pay the mortgages on their homes. If we would appropriate money to pay adequate old-age pensions, unemployment insurance, and provide jobs at a living wage for the millions of our unemployed, instead of appropriating money for battleships and munitions of war, we would be recognized as the most humane country in the

Mr. MAVERICK. Mr. Chairman, I rise to offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Maverick: On page 10, line 7, after the word "exceed", strike out "five medical officers, $2,033,029" and insert "sixty-five medical officers, $2,119,429."

Mr. MAVERICK. Mr. Chairman, this amounts to an increase of about $80,000. We have in our Army certain medical officers who stay with the flying corps, who fly with them and take all of the risks that the flying officers take by going through very hazardous service.

As a member of the Military Affairs Committee, I have requested information from the War Department and I have communications from the Surgeon General and the Chief of the Air Corps, by which it was brought out that if these medical officers are eliminated it will-

First, greatly eliminate the medical service which may be given the Air Corps in active operation of field training and combat.

Second, limit the sphere of effective function of medical officers in maintaining physical fitness for flying.

Third, increase the incidents of aircraft accidents.

Third, increase the incidents of aircraft accidents. Fourth, deprive the Air Corps and indirectly all aviation of the great advantages to be granted in the solution of the many human problems which involve physical and physiological effects of flying, knowledge of which can be obtained only by flight experience. From a service standpoint solely, the functional limitations which removal of medical officers from flying status will necessitate, will severely curtail the kind of medical service which flying requires for security and proficiency of Air Corps personnel. From an economical standpoint, the adoption of a policy of denying flight status and pay to medical officers will be wasteful.

I also have telegrams from different people who are flight Reserve officers, who have no individual interest in this, from Charles F. Guenther, from Lamar Seeligson, and Bernard Ladon. Two of them, I believe, are Reserve officers in the Air Service; all three of them are distinguished citizens of southwest Texas.

Mr. KVALE. Will the gentleman ask permission to put those telegrams in the RECORD?

Mr. MAVERICK. Yes.

Mr. KVALE. I ask that for the reason that the gentleman has laid his finger upon a sensitive spot. These medical officers who fly in actual test conditions and take power dives to determine the effect upon the physique of the fiver and their resistance to the reactions of the power dives, tests for gas conditions, and other hazardous conditions surrounding the work of these pilots, should not be eliminated by this so-called "economy." I am glad the gentleman is waging his fight, and I hope he will be successful.

Mr. MAVERICK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to place these telegrams in the RECORD, and also the recommendation of the Surgeon General, which brings out the various factors in relation to the physical and psychological effect of flying in the air.

Now, we appropriate billions of dollars to be used at the discretion of the President, and I voted for that and will continue to do so, and then we get up here and quibble about a few thousand dollars. These boys go up into the air, some of them 21 years of age. They have certain psychic reactions and certain nervous reactions. They should have the protection of good medical officers in the Army. If this appropriation of eighty or ninety thousand dollars will save one human life, it will be worth the money. I would be willing to spend much more to save one life.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to include these

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

The documents referred to are as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT. Office of the Surgeon General, Washington, February 21, 1935.

Washington, February 21, 1935.

Hon. Maury Maverick,

House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

My Dear Mr. Maverick: In compliance with conversation a few minutes ago on the telephone, in which you requested information concerning the need for flight surgeons in the Army, I advise you that the Chief of the Air Corps has approved 65 flight surgeons, and those were the figures that he sent to the Bureau of the Budget, and his representative so testified in the hearings before the military subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee. (See remarks of Colonel Hobley on page 153 of the printed hearings.)

The bill, H. R. 5913, as written, only makes provision for five medical officers on flight-surgeon's pay. Therefore, the number of medical officers as written in the bill, 5, would have to be increased to 65. As money for the payment of 5 medical officers as flight surgeons is already provided for in the bill, it would only be necessary to increase the amount by a sum sufficient to care for 60 additional flight surgeons, or 60 times $1,440 per annum; that is, $86,400. Therefore, in line 7, on page 10, of H. R. 5913, the figure "5" should be stricken out and the figure "65" inserted, and, on the same line, the amount, $2,033,029, should be increased by $86,400. The sum should then read "$2,119,429."

In this connection I enclose a copy of a memorandum addressed

In this connection I enclose a copy of a memorandum addressed to me by the Chief, Medical Division, Office of the Chief of the Air Corps, which clearly sets forth the necessity for flight surgeons. If I can give you any further information, advise me. It should be clearly understood that the legislative action proposed—that is, the failure to provide for a reasonable number of flight surgeons, will—

1. Greatly limit the medical service which may be given the Air Corps in the active operations of field training and combat;

2. Limit the sphere of effective function of medical officers to

3. Increase the incidence of aircraft accidents;

4. Deprive the Air Corps, and indirectly all aviation, of the great advantages to be gained in the solution of the many human problems which involve physical and psychological effects of flying, knowledge of which can be obtained only by flight experience.

From an economical standpoint the adoption of a policy of denying flight status and pay to medical officers will be wasteful.

I deeply appreciate the interest you are taking in the Medical Corps. It seems very important that the number of flight surgeons considered necessary by the Chief of the Air Corps should be authorized, particularly so at this time as under the present plans the General Headquarters Air Force will be left without medical service during its field-training operations.

With kindest regards.

When the relatively small number of flight surgeons maintained When the relatively small number of flight surgeons maintained on a flying status, which has averaged approximately 60 during the period indicated above, is taken into consideration, these figures will illustrate the degree of hazard involved in this work. I understand a bill is before the House limiting flying pay to only five flight surgeons in Air Corps. I believe flight surgeons on flying status are essential to welfare of the Air Corps, and that proposed legislation limiting flying pay will be very detrimental. Best regards,

San Antonio, Tex., February 20, 1935.

Hon. Maury Maverick, Texas,

House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

Army appropriation bill reported to House limits flight surgeons on flying status to maximum of five. If passed, this will eliminate an indispensable medical service to Air Corps at most critical time of the Air Corps reorganization. All flight surgeons on duty with Air Corps should remain on flying status, continue to accompany Air Corps units on flying missions, receive flying pay the same as Air Corps officers, and engage in research in the air with view to solving the many problems now being created by the augmented speed and altitude toward which airplane development and maneuverability is now being pointed. As result of the work they are able to do while on a flying status flight surgeons are saving lives of flyers and the loss of ships and share the same hazard as any other officer who is required to take to the air. The work of a flight surgeon will be rendered ineffectual if he is grounded and not permitted to make necessary observations on personnel and material while in flight.

BERNARD LADON.

Mr. PARKS. Mr. Chairman, I dislike very much to disagree with my distinguished young friend from Texas [Mr. MAYERICK ]. While it is true the amount involved is not flight physicians who would get a 50-percent addition to their pay up to a maximum extra allowance of $1,440 per annum were it not for this limitation in the bill.

The only thing on earth they do is to go up at their discretion, or at the discretion of their commanding officers. and look at a flyer's back while he is piloting a plane. They cannot examine him while he is in the plane; they could not help him if anything occurred to him. But they could examine him before he went up and after he came down and ascertain the physical effect of the flight; and that is the only thing on the face of the earth they can do except draw 50 percent additional pay. If this were of any value on earth except to give additional pay, I would be just as quick as any man in this House to vote for it. As I said, the doctors can examine these men before they go up and again when they come down. I believe that to adopt this amendment would be an absolute waste of money which could be better used somewhere else.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman vield?

Mr. PARKS. I vield.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Is it not a fact that a great portion of the appropriations we have been making for extra pay to pilots to train flying forces and to induce them to become trained pilots has been taken up and squandered by officers of the Army, such as doctors and others, who were not flyers and who were not being trained as flyers, but who were given extra pay when they flew? This is one right step in the direction of stopping it.

Mr. PARKS. Yes. These are not pilots, as the gentleman understands.

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BURDICK. I make a point of order against this section of the bill on the ground that it is legislation on an appropriation bill. I refer specifically to lines 16, 17, and 18.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, the point of order comes too late.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the point of order comes too late; debate has already been had on the section, or on an amendment proposed to the section.

The point of order is overruled.

The question recurs on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MAVERICK].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. THOMASON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment. The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Thomason: On page 10, line 14, beginning with the word "together", strike out all matter down through the word "men" in line 21 and insert in lieu thereof the following: "together with the additional sum of $5,095,748 to be available under this and other appropriations contained in this act for defraying the cost of increasing the enlisted strength of the Regular Army from an average of 118,250 to an average of 130,321 enlisted men."

Mr. THOMASON. Mr. Chairman, I am not a militarist; neither am I an expert on military affairs; but I am willing to listen to and accept the advice of those whom I believe know something about this subject. For 4 years I have sat upon the Military Affairs Committee of this House and have heard the highest officials in the Army, as well as many prominent civilians who have had much military experience. particularly in the World War, say that our Army today is absolutely inadequate. Testimony has been adduced before the House Committee on Military Affairs, before the Senate Committee on Military Affairs, and also before special committees that an increase is necessary. A bill is now on the calendar, of which I am the author, and it has the unanimous support of the committee. Likewise there comes a recommendation from the Secretary of War, who is not a fighting man but who comes from civilian life and who represents the President and the administration, which says that our forces now are too small, because the combat branches include only about 60,000 men. There comes the recommendation of the Chief of Staff, who has a brilliant military record, setting forth his views, and, as was said yesterday, there was given bequite $100,000, this money is uselessly spent. There are 76 fore the committee the testimony of an outstanding civilian who distinguished himself as Secretary of War during President Wilson's administration, Mr. Newton D. Baker, who said he favored increasing the enlisted forces by 46,250 men, which is necessary to bring the number of enlisted men up to the smallest estimate any witness favored, which was 165,000.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. THOMASON. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. I am with my colleague from Texas on his proposition for adequate Army personnel. But with the Secretary of War, who is a Cabinet officer, heartily in favor of the proposition; with a former Democratic Secretary of War, Newton D. Baker, heartily in favor of it; with high Army officers all approving it; and when this committee has authorized the President, in his discretion, to increase the enlisted personnel to 165,000 men and we are appropriating in this bill the money for him to do so, how much further should we go?

Mr. THOMASON. The bill as presented here leaves it to his discretion. I want to make it definite and certain, so we will be sure to get some increase. Further increases can come leter

Mr. BLANTON. This committee can direct the President, as we are not a legislative committee. Even if you pass an amendment to this appropriation bill and make specific appropriation for $5,000,000 hoping thereby to enlist more men, you will not increase the size of the Army one man. As Chief Executive and Commander in Chief of the Army the President will use or not use the money as he sees fit, exercising his own judgment.

Mr. THOMASON. I am inclined to think we ought specifically to appropriate the money to increase the Army by one-fourth of the 46,250 increase recommended by all the patriotic organizations, the high officials, and prominent men of experience. The amendment does only this, it says that our enlisted personnel is increased one-quarter of that amount, which means about 11,000 men at a cost of about $5,000,000.

Mr. BLANTON. If the amendment were adopted, we would be in no better shape than we would be without it, because the President would not be compelled to expand the Army or to increase the number of enlisted men, unless he wanted to so spend the money.

Mr. THOMASON. Yes; but when we carry such a provision in this appropriation bill it is something specific and ought to be mandatory. The increased appropriation being in the bill would at least indicate to the President that the Congress wants him to exercise the discretion with which he is clothed.

The President has indicated his thought that the combat forces of this country ought to be increased. Why not make a direct appropriation in this bill and be done with it?

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THOMASON. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. MAY. I did not have the pleasure of hearing the testimony of former Secretary of War Baker during this session, but the gentleman from Texas will remember that when he testified before our committee last year he stated in very emphatic terms that the present establishment was wholly inadequate, even in peace times.

Mr. THOMASON. Not only that, but he testified he would raise it right now to the entire 165,000. This amendment I have offered will only increase it to a total of 130,312. In view of the fact that all of these people have endorsed this matter, I think now is the time to make the change if it is going to be made. It will at least be a part of a loaf and a step in the right direction.

Mr. PARKS. Mr. Chairman, I think this will be the only item in the bill about which there will be much controversy. May I inquire how much time we may devote to this paragraph, so that those who may want to speak on it may be prepared?

Mr. BOLTON. How much time would the gentleman suggest?

Mr. PARKS. Suppose we make it 30 minutes.

Mr. BOLTON. Fifteen minutes on a side?

Mr. PARKS. Yes.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 30 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I am not going to use 5 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, I feel that we should specify the amount in this bill that is to be used for the purpose of increasing the Army. It is true that the President does not have to use it if he feels it should not be used, because he is the Commander in Chief; but I feel that under the Constitution it is our duty to appropriate specifically for the Army requirements. This amendment does not increase the total appropriation in the bill because the bill, as it is now drawn, would permit the President to go further than the $5,000,000 which is authorized here. It would permit him to go as far as $23,000,000.

Mr. Chairman, this does tell the story of what ought to be done in the way of increasing the personnel of the Army for the first year. I hope that the amendment will be adopted, so that the man who comes to look at this legislation may see right on the face of it just how much money has been appropriated for the pay and maintenance of the enlisted men of the Army.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. Suppose we pass this amendment and the President should see fit not to exercise his prerogative and discretion as Chief Executive and as Commander in Chief of the Army, and does not increase, and does not spend the money, he does not have to do so?

Mr. TABER. No; he does not have to do it, but unquestionably he will do it, and unquestionably the amount of money will be used and we should tell the people the truth about what is in the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. But he may still do that under the provisions of this bill, as we are giving him enough money for 165,000 men.

Mr. TABER. Certainly he can, but let us state in the bill just exactly what we are doing; let us meet our own responsibilities and not cover up the whole situation as much as possible.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. MAY. If we adopt this amendment, it will be at least an indication that the House of Representatives is still willing to say what it thinks should be done?

Mr. TABER. Yes; and it will tell out and out what it is doing and not try to cover up.

Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment will be adopted and that the House will say it wants to do this and how it wants it to be done.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I want to make a plain, simple statement to the Members of this House. We are living in an unsettled time in this country. According to the press there are disturbing activities in many sections of the country aimed at the existence of our Government. How far these domestic disturbers will increase I do not know; but the committee deliberately put this section and another similar section in the bill to permit the President, at his discretion, to increase the Army, as well as the National Guard, in case conditions warranted such increases. He may increase the Regular Army under the provisions of the bill up to the amount appropriated for in the bill, or by a little over 46,000 enlisted men, making a total of 165,000 enlisted men, if he thinks conditions justify such a course, and that expansion is necessary to preserve the peace and tranquility of our country.

Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas would be a congressional expression that the President could not increase the enlisted strength of the Regular Army by more than 11,000 men. In other words, the amendment cuts off the discretion of the President to increase the number up to the limit, or 165,000 men, for which we appropriate.

Mr. ANDREWS of New York. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. BUCHANAN. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. ANDREWS of New York. We do not necessarily have to limit it if we make it mandatory.

Mr. BUCHANAN. It is limited by the amount of the appropriation. Existing law will allow the President, subject to appropriation, to increase up to 175,000 men. That is on the statute books now. The amount of increase is limited by the amount of money which we appropriate. In this bill, as it came from the committee, it carried an indefinite appropriation whereby the President may actually increase the enlisted personnel by 46,000 men.

Mr. ANDREWS of New York. What does the gentleman suppose the Senate is going to do to this section? Does he think they are going to allow us to extend this discretion to the President?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I thank God I am not responsible for the conduct of the Senate. I never speculate on what it is going to do and never take into consideration what it is going to do. I try to do my duty to my country, as I see it, and let the Senate attend to its business.

Mrs. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the President has enough to do without piling one more duty on his shoulders, particularly as it means—and let us use plain language—shirking our own duty here. It is up to us to decide definitely just exactly what the size of the Army should be and how much money should be appropriated therefor. Why should we delegate another of our powers? We are doing this constantly, and before the session is over if we keep this up we will have no power left. It is not only a question of our power, but it is our plain duty to appropriate definitely and distinctly and to tell the country exactly what we want. It seems to me we should save the President this extra duty rather than put an additional duty upon his shoulders. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I am afraid that, however much it was not intended, this amendment carries with it the reflection that the House does not have explicit confidence in the Chief Executive of this Nation, who is the Commander in Chief of the United States Army. Is there a Member of this House who does not believe the President of the United States, with the record he has made and has behind him for the last 20 years, is not thoroughly and keenly alive to the great issue of national defense?

Mr. ANDREWS of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly. Is the gentleman one of those who has no confidence in the President on this question? If he is, I will yield to him.

Mr. ANDREWS of New York. I am wondering if the

Mr. BLANTON. Has the gentleman confidence in the President?

Mr. ANDREWS of New York. I have reasonable confidence in him.

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly; and I have absolute confidence in him, especially on this question.

Mr. ANDREWS of New York. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BLANTON. Briefly, yes.

Mr. ANDREWS of New York. I know the gentleman from Texas is a very strong supporter of the President, and I am wondering if he would yield to the discretion of the President in the matter of the soldiers' bonus. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. That is a question that everyone of us must decide for himself. That is a question upon which the President of the United States is not the commander in chief. That question is not within the scope of his duties as Chief Executive. He has certain well-defined duties. And Congress likewise has duties. I have the right to exercise my prerogative on the floor of the House and in the Congress of the United States on the question of paying the adjusted-service certificates, even more than the President, because it is the duty of this Congress to provide for the payment of all just debts promptly due by the United States.

Mr. BOLTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. BLANTON. In just a moment I will yield to my friend from Ohio. I must use a few minutes of the time myself.

The question of the payment of the adjusted-service certificates is one for the Congress to decide. Of course, the President has the veto power and then we have the right, if we want to exercise our prerogative, to override his veto; but the question of national defense is one concerning which the President of the United States is the head of the whole institution. I am one of those who is willing to rely upon his judgment, upon his patriotism, and upon his loyalty to the flag and to the country to provide adequate national defense when we give him the money to do it. And we have done that in this bill. We have placed in this bill an appropriation providing enough money to pay for 165,000 enlisted men in the Army, and 5,000 additional National Guard, and the President of the United States has authority to order the War Department to put their recruiting officers in the field and enlist up to 165,000 men and there is money in this bill to pay them.

Are you not willing to leave this to the President when he wants you to leave it to him? I am. I am not going to get up here on this floor and say, "Mr. President, I am a Democrat, but I am not following you on a question of this kind."

Of course, I expect the Republicans on the other side of the aisle to get up here and try to hamstring him if they can, and try to embarrass him on this question if they can. And they will vote solidly for this amendment. Watch them stand up across that aisle. Talk about taking a load off of the President, you are putting a load upon him whenever you pass an amendment of this kind. And if you pass this amendment, you will force the President to send us a request tomorrow to undo it and vote it down in the House.

Mr. BOLTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. BLANTON. Oh, I follow my friend from Cleveland, Colonel Bolton, on matters quite frequently. I have the highest regard for his integrity and his loyalty. He is a great help to the Democratic members of this committee. He knows we should not hamstring the President in this way—and this would be hamstringing him.

Mr. BOLTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly.

Mr. BOLTON. The gentleman inferred at least, although I do not think he intended it, that he was going to allow politics to enter into national defense. There should be no politics in this issue if we do what we believe to be right.

Mr. BLANTON. Watch the record vote in the House. You will see practically a solid Republican vote, and I predict that after we hear from the President on it tomorrow, there will be almost a solid Democratic vote against this amendment, if it carries in the committee. The President is not going to allow politics to enter into our national defense, and politics should not enter this Chamber.

Do not the Members of this House know that my colleague the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Buchanan], Chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, is in close touch with the President and has frequent conferences with him at the White House; and do you not know that the President has let us know what he wants, and if the President were not satisfied, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Buchanan] would have had this committee provide the money specifically in this bill?

Mr. FADDIS. Mr. Chairman, it may be that my good friend, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Blanton], would regard this matter as a hamstringing of the President. I, as a Democrat, cannot feel that way about it.

I conceive it my duty as a Member of the Congress, to carry out the provisions of the Constitution that delegate the power of providing for the national defense to the Congress of the United States. The Constitution does not say that the Congress shall delegate this power to any one individual.

We have had experience in the past in matters that would relate very closely to this one and we know they have not always been carried out in accordance with our wishes as Members of the Congress. We of the Committee on Military Affairs sat for days listening to testimony of men who know what is demanded in the way of national defense for this country, and we have unanimously backed the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Thomason].

We have determined that so far as we are concerned we are going to fulfill our duty as Members of this House and provide for an adequate national defense, and I think we would be weak and without proper regard for our duty if we did not do so.

I fail to see where there is any question of politics entering into national defense, and any attempt to drag in any political inferences is only an attempt to befog the issue.

[Applause.] I thank you.

Mr. CULKIN. I have been somewhat amazed, Mr. Chairman, by the extraordinary argument of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Blanton]. He has endeavored to excite the other side of the aisle and get them in a partisan mood on the question of national defense.

The House will notice that the amendment in question was offered by a gentleman on the other side of the aisle, a Member well informed and most familiar with military questions.

May I say again there is no politics in national defense, and has not been since the Republic was founded.

My judgment is that the President will welcome this amendment, for as the gentlewoman from California says, it takes a burden off his shoulders.

This amendment simply adds to the money appropriated for national defense the sum of $5,000,000 for the purpose of increasing the Army by 11,000 enlisted men. It is a start in the right direction. Our Army is pitifully inadequate for national safety.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. CULKIN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MAY. Is the gentleman willing to follow the gentleman from Arkansas when he said that we were already sitting on a volcano at home and abroad, and that our present Regular Army only equaled the police force in New York, Philadelphia, and Chicago?

Mr. CULKIN. I thank the gentleman for his contribution. We are sitting on a volcano, and every true American who knows the possibilities of the world situation is for a fair measure of preparedness.

Mr. Chairman, what I rose to emphasize is that there is no reason given for dragging a political red herring across the trail of national preparedness. Mr. Chairman, by voting for amendment this House takes a step in the right direction and inaugurates a proper program for a modest increase in our land forces.

Mr. HOOK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULKIN. I yield.

Mr. HOOK. I am for adequate national defense, but will the gentleman answer this question: why did the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. Fish] bring in partisan politics without any objection from the other side, and now they claim that they do not want partisan politics?

Mr. CULKIN. Does the gentleman want to hold national defense responsible for the alleged sins of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Fish]? Is the question of national security to be intermingled with and neglected by reason of the alleged partisan remarks of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Fish]?

Mr. BLANTON. He is one of the active, strong leaders on your side of the aisle.

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, I object to the interruption of the gentleman from Texas. I have not yielded to him. I think it is entirely improper for this situation to be tinged with partisan politics. I am for this amendment because it makes America slightly more secure.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULKIN. I yield.

Mr. BUCHANAN. The gentleman is in favor of preparedness?

Mr. CULKIN. Yes; I am.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Does the gentleman know that this bill now permits the President to take care of a Regular Army of 165,000 men? This amendment limits the appropriation so that he cannot increase it over 11,000. There is no command either way under either bill. There is no command about it in the committee's bill and no command in the amendment. He is just authorized to do it, so that the amendment is a step backward in the matter of national defense.

Mr. CULKIN. I thank the distinguished Chairman of the Appropriations Committee for his information, but my advices are that the section in question, as it now stands, is simply permissive. This provision makes it mandatory and will, in my opinion, if adopted by the House and Senate, meet the approval of the President. The House cannot rid itself of its constitutional responsibility by placing another burden on the shoulders of the President.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Culkin] has expired.

The Chair will advise that those in favor of the amendment have 3 minutes remaining, and those opposed to the amendment have  $6\frac{1}{2}$  minutes remaining.

Mr. MAVERICK. Mr. Chairman, I have as much confidence in the President of the United States as anybody in this House, but I believe this House should have some confidence in itself. [Applause.] I believe we should vote for this amendment. It has the unanimous approval of the Committee on Military Affairs. Twenty-five members of that committee are in favor of it. Aside from that, right or wrong, we should either vote for something or against something. Why load the President down with this responsibility? He will no doubt have delegations worrying him with a heavy mass of correspondence. Let us assume our responsibility.

Mr. BOLTON. Mr. Chairman, I did not intend to speak on this subject, because we had our discussion in committee, and I am one of those who was not successful in my belief that we should write a definite appropriation in the bill. However, I do want to make myself clear in this position. I very much believe in the statement made by the lady from California [Mrs. KAHN] that it is much fairer to the President of the United States to be definite in our wishes with reference to military defense and with reference to the appropriations for the Army than to leave it to his judgment. True it is, he is Commander in Chief of the Army. True it is, he will have the advice of the Chief of Staff and of our military experts; but I believe in these times, where there are forces for as well as against preparedness, the people of the country should know the wishes of the Congress and the President should be fortified in what he does by direct action by Congress.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOLTON. I gladly yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MAY. Another reason why we should take off the shoulders of the President this burden is because he is beseiged and beset on all sides for money by this whole gang of bureaucrats, and we are not.

Mr. BOLTON. That is correct. Without getting into any argument as to the advantages of increasing the Army, in which we all agree, not only from a military standpoint but from the standpoint of unemployment, I believe it is our duty as Members of a body that is supposed to appropriate money, that we be definite in this matter.

I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. PARKS. Mr. Chairman, it is evident that this amendment is greatly misunderstood. It does not increase the Army one single, solitary man. It is not as liberal as the provision in the bill. The bill provides that the President, at his discretion, may increase the Army to 165,000 men, and it makes an indefinite appropriation to take care of the increased cost. What does this amendment do? It does but one thing. It carries an appropriation, without Budget support, of $5,000,000, and that should not be done.

If it is necessary to increase the Army, if the President of the United States with his advisers in the Army and his budgetary adviser believes that the exigencies of the situation demand an increase in the Army, he can increase it and he can draw on this indefinite appropriation just as readily and effectively as under this $5,000,000 direct appropriation that has been proposed. It ought not to be done.

We have worked and struggled along with the members, on the other side, of this committee to hold this bill within the Budget recommendations. You do not by the amendment add a single man to the Army. The amendment is not mandatory. You could not put mandatory legislation in this bill to compel the President of the United States to add that many men to the Army under our rules, but as we have written the bill it provides that we can have not to exceed 165,000 men or a lesser number, subject to determination by the President. If you pass this amendment, you will lessen the number by which the Army may be increased and not increase it.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKS. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. If we were to pass this amendment, would not the President consider it a direction to him by Congress not to increase over the 11,000, whereas under the bill as it is written he has absolute authority to increase it up to 165,000?

Mr. PARKS. That is correct.

Mr. THOMASON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKS. I yield.

Mr. THOMASON. Is it not a fact that under the National Defense Act the President has authority to increase the Army to 200,000?

Mr. PARKS. If he has the money; yes.

Mr. THOMASON. And so far as the appropriation it carries, is not this amendment just as mandatory as any other provision of this bill?

Mr. PARKS. There is not a mandatory provision in the bill. The amendment absolutely limits the President to this five million and some odd thousand dollars and 11,000 men. It does not provide anything beyond that. However, here is the point about it: If the President should find it necessary to increase the Army and we adopt this amendment, he would be so situated that although it would be necessary to go to 165,000 men he would not have that authority under the amendment that has been proposed, and he would not have the money. Here we have made the money available to him under this indefinite appropriation. I say to every patriotic man here, and it make no difference where you sit in this House, you should not limit this bill. There is no man in this House who is more strongly for national defense than I am, and I say the amendment is restrictive and, therefore, not in the best interests of national defense.

Mr. THOMASON. Will the gentleman support an amendment if I change the amendment to include the entire 165,000?

Mr. PARKS. We already have that.

Mr. THOMASON. But you have no appropriation for it. Mr. PARKS. Yes. We have the appropriation in the bill and authority for the President to increase the enlisted strength at will. That is why I am standing for this. That is why I believe the Membership in this House, in the limited debate we have had, have not had an opportunity to understand it.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKS. I yield.

Mr. RAMSPECK. If the contention of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. Parks] is correct, that this amendment is not mandatory and that the provision is already in the bill to do that, what difference does it make one way or the other?

Mr. PARKS. It makes this difference: Under the bill the President may or may not, at his discretion, increase the enlisted strength to 165,000 men. Under the amendment he may not increase it beyond some 130,000 and odd, and if he does not increase it we are in the position of having added $5,000,000 to his Budget unnecessarily.

Mr. TABER. The gentleman's proposition is $23,000,000 above the Budget.

Mr. PARKS. No, it is not; this amendment is $5,000,000 over the Budget. If the President does not desire to increase the enlisted strength, and it is optional with him under the committee's provision, as well as under the pending amendment, whether he will or will not, the committee's provision is not one single penny over the Budget.

I hope the amendment will be voted down.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Thomason].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. Faddis) there were—ayes 81, noes 66.

Mr. PARKS. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed as tellers Mr. Parks and Mr. Thomason.

The Committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 97, noes 66.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

None of the money appropriated in this act shall be used to pay any officer on the retired list of the Army who for himself or for others engages in the selling, contracting for the sale of, negotiating for the sale of, or furnishing to the Army or the War Department any supplies, materials, equipment, lands, buildings, plants, vessels, or munitions. None of the money appropriated in this act shall be paid to any officer on the retired list of the Army who, having been retired before reaching the age of 64, is employed in the United States or its possessions by any individual, partnership, corporation, or association regularly or frequently engaged in making direct sales of any merchandise or material to the War Department or the Army.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Yesterday the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Cochran] stated that he had offered me an amendment which would prohibit the Philadelphia quartermaster department from manufacturing clothing, and also stated that I did not care to present the amendment. I stated to Mr. Cochran that it was in my State of Pennsylvania and that I did not expect to offer any amendment, but that if he would do as he said he would do—offer the amendment—I would not only vote for it but I would support it. This, the gentleman well understands, is my position and always has been. I am opposed to the Government in business regardless of where it is, in any State of the Union.

Two years ago I inspected the plant at Philadelphia. They were then employing some 1,200 people, making not only Army uniforms but overalls, towels, bags, handkerchiefs, and a great many other simple articles that anyone could manufacture.

With the aid of the Quartermaster General of the Army, General DeWitt, also Colonel Game, who had charge of the plant at Philadelphia, and Mr. Christie, superintendent of the plant, we figured that six or seven hundred operators could manufacture all the uniforms the Army would need, considering the number of men enlisted. By discontinuing those items of minor importance they were manufacturing they then would not be keeping their plant in full operation and overproducing for Army needs, placing in storage much more equipment than they needed, and thus tying up capital and manufacturing supplies and uniforms that may become out-of-date or obsolete, which was the result with much of their stock on hand. The manufacturers who were objecting to the operation of the uniform plant also agreed if they would gradually cut down their operators to 500 or 600 and only make uniforms, then the manufacturers would withdraw their objections. Thus an amicable adjustment between parties was effected. So we cut down, as was stated by the gentleman from Missouri yesterday, the number of items that will be manufactured from 100 to 25, the direct result of the work of investigation of the Special Committee to Investigate Government Competition with Private Industry.

Mr. Chairman, speaking as one who is interested in not permitting the Government to operate the industries of this Nation and in prohibiting the Government's engaging in anything that will interfere with the rights of its citizens and put them out of business, I contend that, since the Governthem to eliminate people from business then we are on the road to a soviet union. We are headed for that state more today than ever. Will this Congress permit it to go on?

The appropriations in this bill carry permission for additional facilities for equipment in dry cleaning and laundry. It permits the uniform factory at Philadelphia to make uniforms for the National Guard, for the Reserve officers, and citizens' military training camps-which was not permitted a year ago. The bill also provides for coffee-roasting plants, saddlery shops, arsenals to manufacture equipment that has heretofore been manufactured in private enterprise. Why permit this to go on?

You, as Members of Congress, are responsible, and I appeal to you members of the committee to amend this bill in conformity to the wish of the people and industries of this Nation who pay the taxes and support the Government.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. I yield.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. How long has this depot been in existence?

Mr. RICH. I do not know; but I think for a great many

Mr. FITZPATRICK. And it employs about 1,000 people, does it not?

Mr. RICH. It employs about 1,000 people, so I understand. Mr. FITZPATRICK. These people will be thrown out of employment if such an amendment is adopted.

Mr. RICH. Not necessarily. Arrangements can be made whereby they can be assimilated into other industries in the cities and towns. There is no reason why they should be thrown out of work.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I am against the Government engaging in business; but if we close this depot, it will throw out of employment 1,000 people who have been employed there for years and years.

Mr. RICH. This same 1,000 people will be employed in other industries; and there is no reason why the Government should continue to engage in business.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. They have been in this business there for years and years, and there are 1,000 American citizens employed in this plant there now.

Mr. RICH. Because the Government has been in business all these years is no reason why they should continue to be in business. The gentleman will find that by the money appropriated in this bill to carry on these industries the Government will be put still more into competition with private business.

Mr. FADDIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. I yield.

Mr. FADDIS. Will the gentleman take these people now employed in the Government depot into his own woolen fac-

Mr. RICH. We will do everything we can. I believe the industry of this country will soon afford employment to the people engaged on this Government work.

Mr. FADDIS. The gentleman is evading the issue. Will the gentleman guarantee that the people there now will be reemployed if this plant is closed?

Mr. RICH. They will find employment in other industries.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Will the gentleman guarantee that? Mr. RICH. Yes; if the Congress will eliminate Government competition with private business. If the Congress does that these people will soon be absorbed in other lines of industry.

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. RICH. I yield.

Mr. RANSLEY. Will the gentleman tell the House how many contracts his firm received from the quartermaster's depot last year?

Mr. RICH. I think we received one contract last year from the quartermaster's depot. We turned the contract over to the Penn Garment Co. in Williamsport, because they were unable to get a contract from the Government. We ment is the people, when the taxpayers' money is used against | turned over to them the only quartermaster contract we got last year.

Mr. RANSLEY. The gentlemen's firm sublet the contract? Mr. RICH. Yes.

Mr. RANSLEY. That was a contract for the manufacture of shirts?

Mr. RICH. Yes.

Mr. RANSLEY. What about the contract for blouses? Mr. RICH. They were manufactured in our plant.

I may say to my colleague from Philadelphia that in taking the attitude I have I am not interested in getting this business. I am interested in the proposition that the manufacturers of his country who are paying the taxes to support the Government should not be faced with Government competition in a business which rightfully belongs to the manufacturers. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.] The Clerk read as follows:

Subsistence of the Army: Purchase of subsistence supplies: For issue as rations to troops, including retired enlisted men when ordered to active duty, civil employees when entitled thereto, hospital matrons, applicants for enlistment while held under observation, general prisoners of war (including Indians held by the Army as prisoners but for whose subsistence appropriation is not otherwise made), Indians employed by the Army as guides and scouts, and general prisoners at posts; ice for issue to organizations of enlisted men and officers at such places as the Secretary of War may determine and for preservation of stores: Secretary of War may determine, and for preservation of stores; for the subsistence of the masters, officers, crews, and employees of the vessels of the Army Transport Service; meals for recruiting parties and applicants for enlistment while under observation; for sales to officers, including members of the Officers' Reserve Corps while on active duty, and enlisted men of the Army. For payments: Of the regulation allowances of commutation in lieu of rations to enlisted men on furlough, and to enlisted men when stationed at places where rations in kind cannot be economically issued, including retired enlisted men when ordered to active duty. For payment of the regulation allowance of commutation in lieu of rations for enlisted men, applicants for enlistment while held under observation, civilian employees who are entitled to subsistence at public expense, and general prisoners while sick in hospitals, to be paid to the surgeon in charge; advertis-ing; for providing prizes to be established by the Secretary of War ing; for providing prizes to be established by the Secretary of war for enlisted men of the Army who graduate from the Army schools for bakers and cooks, the total amount of such prizes at the various schools not to exceed $900 per annum; and for other necessary expenses incident to the purchase, testing, care, preservation, issue, sale, and accounting for subsistence supplies for the Army; in all, $18,601,297: Provided, That none of the money appropriated in this act shall be used for the purchase of oleomargarine or butter substitutes for other than cooking purposes, except to supply an expressed preference therefor or for use where climatic or other conditions render the use of butter where climatic or other conditions render the use of butter impracticable.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, in times of catastrophe we seldom think or speak deliberately and dispassionately. I have been very much interested in reading some of the observations concerning the unfortunate loss of the Macon; and I think some statements that were not dispassionate and that were not deliberate have been made with reference to this lamentable occurrence.

We have a great many automobile wrecks each year, but automobiles continue to run. We have numerous accidents on railroads, involving quite a toll of human lives, but trains continue to operate. One steamship company in the United States has recently lost, or had seriously damaged, three of its vessels, yet steamships continue to ply the waters. We have lost three dirigibles, and I want to bring it to the attention of the committee that in spite of this fact dirigibles also are being operated successfully.

We should be slow to abandon the use of this implement of defense. This country, of course, is fortunately circumstanced in having a practical monopoly of helium, the noninflammable, inert gas which has a buoyancy of about 92 percent that of hydrogen.

No other nation under the sun has this element in sufficient volume to justify with absolute safety lighter-than-air operations. I wish to call it to your attention that the German Government has been operating dirigibles without the use of this noninflammable nonexplosive element for many years, | and that the large Graf Zeppelin now in their service has crossed and recrossed the Atlantic Ocean over and over again and is now running on a regular schedule without accident and without mishap.

What has led to the destruction of dirigibles in this country, especially in view of the fact that we have this valuable asset of helium? I think I may speak dispassionately now with reference to this element by reason of the fact that it is no longer produced in the district which I represent. I talked about it many times in this Chamber in years gone by, when in the early period of operation, perhaps many who heard me did not know whether I was speaking about a patent medicine or a breakfast food. The case with reference to helium has been proved. If the gas bags of the Macon had not been inflated with helium, it is likely that every member of the crew would have perished and the inflammable parts of the ship would have gone up in flames before the framework struck the water.

Why have we not operated dirigibles successfully? I think there is one very pertinent cause. That cause is that we do not give adequate training to those who operate these ships and do not retain commissioned personnel in that line of service. Before the destruction of the Shenandoah you will recall that it broke loose from its mooring mast in a storm at Lakehurst. Two or three of the bags filled with helium were ruptured.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, in spite of that fact the ship was brought back safely to the mooring mast in that damaged condition, but it was piloted by a German who had been well trained in that character of aviation. Each one of these ships we have lost has been lost by reason of a storm, the Shenandoah going into a veritable cyclone in order to attend a county or State fair.

Mr. HARLAN. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. LANHAM. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. HARLAN. Does the gentleman remember the experience of Germany in the early days of their lack of experience in training and has he observed the fact that they had more catastrophes than we have had and the fact also that they have now built well over 150 of these ships and are sailing them successfully after having trained the crews and perfected their manufacture?

Mr. LANHAM. And the losses they had originally were due principally to the fact they were using an inflammable element in the inflation of those ships.

I say that every one of these three dirigibles we have lost has been lost in or because of a storm.

The dirigibles as they have been developed have a sufficient speed, if warned properly with reference to meteorological conditions, to get to the outskirts of a storm and avoid the damage that has come to all three of our lighterthan-air ships. The Akron was sent out around stormy Barnegat Bay, where surface ships often have great difficulty. Perhaps we could learn something from the standpoint of construction from the Germans, but there is one thing certain we could learn from them in connection with the successful operation of dirigibles, and that is adequate and continuous training of commissioned personnel.

Commander Rosendahl, who happens to hail from my district, perhaps knows more about the operation of lighterthan-air craft than any other man n this country. He was assigned for a few years to Lakehurst and flew the Los Angeles and other airships many, many times. He was aboard the Shenandoah when it was destroyed. However, as soon as he had finished his tour in the Navy Department with lighter-than-air craft he was sent off to sea, That has been the trouble in our lighter-than-air development. The efficient men should be retained to direct the operation of these ships. The operation of these ships is a highly technical matter, and they are much more difficult to navigate than a vessel on water. About the time we get our commissioned personnel qualified to engage in this activity of our Government their tour of duty is up and they are sent somewhere else and relatively inexperienced officers placed in their stead.

Mr. Chairman, let us not too quickly conclude that because of the recent catastrophe dirigibles have no place, because a little reflection will indicate that one nation at least without our advantages is operating these ships daily with great success. They dodge the storms and through the superior training of their personnel they go to the outer edges of the storms, which they can do by reason of their speed, where the wind will bring them little or no damage.

It may be that the operation of our lighter-than-air craft should be taken out of the hands of the Navy, I do not know, but I do know that in their operation the men who run them should not be shifted from pillar to post. They ought to be kept in that one line of endeavor in order that we may have efficient personnel.

Mr. Chairman, I trust that we will not come to conclusions too rapidly with reference to the practicability and the efficiency of this element of defense.

Mr. SUTPHIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have an additional 5 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOILEAU. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. LANHAM. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.
Mr. BOILEAU. Is it not a fact that, in order for naval officers to secure promotion, those who have been assigned to the aeronautics division are required to have a certain amount of sea duty, and because they want promotion they are forced to this sea duty before they have had an adequate experience in this particular line of work?

Mr. LANHAM. I am not familiar with all the minutia of their system, but I do know it is absolutely true that these officers are kept such a short time in this highly technical line of work that they are not prepared to operate these ships as efficiently as they could be operated. It is no fault of theirs, and I do not make these statements in disparagement of the officers or the crew of the Macon or the Akron or the Shenandoah; but it is a foolish policy to shift these officers about to various branches of the service.

Mr. BOILEAU. May I suggest that the other evening I had a meeting with many mechanics and pilots in the Navy Department and they made the same suggestion, and stated that the main fault with our naval aeronautics is the fact that they change the officers from sea duty to air duty before they become expert in one line or the other.

Mr. LANHAM. I thank the gentleman for that contribution, because one thing is sure, the Germans who are operating these ships successfully keep their trained personnel in this line of work.

Mr. SUTPHIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANHAM. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey. Mr. SUTPHIN. I am very much impressed with the remarks of my friend from Texas. In 1932 I went down to the Navy Department and endeavored to have Commander Rosendahl retained as the commanding officer at the naval air station at Lakehurst and in command of the Akron, but that request was denied by the Bureau at that time.

Mr. LANHAM. I think it is most unfortunate, and I think the policy most regrettable that these men who know most about the operation of airships are sent from one place to another and not allowed to continue both in such operation and in the instruction of the personnel.

Mr. SUTPHIN. I believe what the gentleman has said is correct, and it might be well to take the lighter-than-air ships away from the Navy Department so that they may progress more rapidly and favorably under some other department or bureau.

Mr. LANHAM. I think, certainly, wherever the responsibility may be, we ought to have a different policy of operation; and to say that dirigibles are worthless is to speak foolishly and inadvisedly, because the Germans are operating them, crossing and recrossing the Atlantic month after month

Mrs. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. LANHAM. I yield to the gentlewoman from California.

Mrs. KAHN. I want to ask the gentleman if it is not a confession on our part that we have failed absolutely in a line of endeavor that other nations are carrying on successfully if we now abandon the dirigible?

Mr. LANHAM. I think so, undoubtedly, because we have the advantage of every nation under the sun by reason of the fact that we have a practical monopoly of this asset that makes the navigation of lighter-than-air craft safe from either explosion or conflagration.

Mrs. KAHN. Then, again, why not establish a special bureau in the Navy Department where service on a dirigible would rank with service on a ship and keep our men in this bureau until they are absolutely trained navigators? It seems to me we could have a separate bureau and leave it with the Navy, but simply make their duty in this service comparable with their duty at sea, so they would not have to leave the dirigibles just when they are beginning to know something about them.

Mr. LANHAM. I think something of that kind should be done because I believe that all three of these catastrophes we have had in the lighter-than-air field are largely inexcusable and attributable to a faulty policy.

Mrs. KAHN. Or if they are due to faulty construction, let us remedy our construction and not abandon the whole project.

Mr. LANHAM. I agree very heartily with the gentlewoman from California.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. LANHAM. I yield.

Mr. DONDERO. Does not the gentleman think that as an instrument of war the dirigible is too vulnerable, in view of the high-speed airplanes we have today?

Mr. LANHAM. No; because it is easily within the range of probability, and I think of certainty, that these dirigibles can be so constructed as to carry airplanes themselves that could combat any such attack; and by reason of their invulnerability, due to our use of helium, I think they could be made wenderful weapons if necessary. I think they have quite as important a function with the Army as they have with the Navy, and they have a very decided utility with reference to each branch of our service. [Applause.]

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, the Quartermaster Corps—and the paragraph of the bill we are now considering deals with the Quartermaster Corps—has been acting as supply officers of the conservation camps and have been doing a very good job up until a week or 10 days ago when an order went out providing that supplies for the conservation camps should be purchased through the Army depots. The Army depots cover a number of States. As to Missouri, our camps are now purchasing through Leavenworth, Kans. Before this order went into effect the purchasing officers at the various camps purchased from competing wholesale grocers, and a better quality has been secured than by buying through the Army depots.

The order was issued, I understand, because they wanted the camp buyers to keep within their monthly per-man ration allowance. Well, as far as Missouri is concerned, I understand they have always been within that allowance.

The purpose in establishing these camps was to relieve the unemployment situation by sending the young men in the country into the camps and also to help conditions generally in the various cities and States.

While my State does not have as many conservation camps as some of the others, nevertheless there was about $1,000,000 a year in supplies being purchased within the State for the conservation camps, and under this new procedure wholesale houses in my State have lost the business of furnishing supplies for personnel of the camps.

Yesterday I received a letter from a corporation that makes a powder that is used in pudding. They sent me an order that had been issued to the various camps which showed that in the future they should buy this powder from one of three firms. The firms were named and not one was within 1,200 miles of where a camp is located in my State. Let that State supply its own camps. Let Missouri merchants supply Missouri camps is my motto.

I am arising now to call this condition to the attention of the Members in the hope they will take the matter up with the Quartermaster General and the Secretary of War and do whatever they possibly can to correct this situation. It not only is in Missouri that this is being done, but all over the country, and you will soon hear from your merchants who are deprived of this business.

It seems to me it is perfectly fair that the supplies that are needed for these camps should be purchased in the State where the camps are located, everything else being equal. We must take into consideration the matter of freight rates when we consider a price, and I cannot conceive that supplies can be purchased outside of my State and shipped into the State cheaper than they can be purchased within the boundaries of the State, freight charges being considered. It is true that by buying very large quantities the Army depots are able to probably save about 2 percent, probably 3 percent; but the amount is so small that, taking everything in consideration, it should not even be considered. My merchants are taxpayers and should have the same right as others, and I insist that the supplies in the State should come from the merchants in the States where the camps are located. Every State has its camps, some more than others, and it will be fair for all if the policy is adopted to buy within the State.

One of the outstanding conditions that we have and that is in part the cause of this depression is mass production and mass distribution. We have had too much of it. The big fellow gets it all and the little fellow gets nothing.

We have a purchasing agent for the Quartermaster in my city—St. Louis—although they moved the depot away. He can secure bids for the Missouri camps, if they want to follow that policy, but why not let things go along as they were in the past when everyone was satisfied?

The information I have is that the quality is superior when purchased from the wholesale grocer. This the Department denies, but those in charge of the camps say so when not talking to their superiors.

The director of the conservation camps tells me that while the purchases rest with the War Department, still, in his opinion, all things being equal and the Government not having to pay excessive charges, supplies for the camps should be purchased locally in order that the business may be distributed throughout the country. That is exactly my opinion, and I think it is sound.

I repeat that the camps are not only to give employment to young men but also to help business. It is a poor way to help business by placing it all in the hands of a few rather than the many.

The War Department cannot sustain its position other than by showing that when large quantities are purchased they might get the goods for a few cents cheaper. I am in receipt of a letter telling me that some canned goods arrived at one of the camps and the commodity was packed in small cans like those used in the home, while the wholesale grocers in my city would have furnished the same goods, or their equal, in the large cans that the Army and other Government agencies always demand.

I repeat, I think the Quartermaster Corps should realize that it is only fair to all the States of the Union to let the business concerns within the boundaries of the States where the camps are located have this business, and I hope the Members of the House will look into the situation; and when they find that this condition I say exists does exist, they will file a complaint with the Quartermaster General, [Applause.]

Mr. AMLIE. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Lanham] has observed that we have automobile wrecks and still have automobiles on the highways. We have no dirigibles operating in this country today. I understand that Germany during the war had approximately 80 dirigibles, and now has only a few in operation.

If the operating crew of the Akron, which was destroyed 2 years ago, was changed six times in 1 year, it seems to me the people of the Navy Department in charge of things must be not more than half-witted. If that is the kind of policy they are going to pursue, I do not see why we should give them two-and-a-half-million-dollar toys to play with.

I think the real purpose of the dirigible was brought out in the remarks of the gentleman from Texas when he said that a dirigible is an airplane carrier. That is true, and the Macon could carry 24 airplanes. In other words, a dirigible is not a defensive machine in war, it is an offensive machine. These instruments that can travel 90 miles an hour and carry 24 airplanes are designed for offensive attack. They are unreliable, and would not serve as a defense in time of war, and they are only a means of arousing hostility and suspicion on the part of foreign nations. It seems to me we have gained nothing in building these machines, except to excite suspicion on the part of foreign powers.

I saw a statement in the newspapers a short while ago by a high Navy official in the Navy Department that they were contemplating the holding of the annual Navy maneuvers in the Aleutian Islands next summer. Such a program on our part would result in nothing but arousing grave hostility and fear in certain quarters.

Mr. CARTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AMLIE. I yield.

Mr. CARTER. I have been in the Aleutian Islands and seen there the ships of Japan. Does not the gentleman think we have as much right in the Aleutian Islands as has Japan?

Mr. AMLIE. We have the right to go there and to hold maneuvers there.

Mr. CARTER. We were not alarmed when Japan had her ships there.

Mr. AMLIE. No; they were only a few miles from their shores—I am not denying that we have the right to go there.

Mr. SUTPHIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AMLIE. I yield.

Mr. SUTPHIN. I am sure that the gentleman wants to be accurate. The crew of the Akron was not changed six times in a year. It was not designed to carry 24 airplanes and was never supposed to carry more than 5, and, further, it did not have a speed of 100 miles an hour but 90 miles an hour.

Mr. AMLIE. I am only relating the testimony of General Mitchell before the Patent Committee a week ago.

Mr. SUTPHIN. Did General Mitchell ever fly in the Macon or the Akron, and was he speaking from his own knowledge and experience, or hearsay?

Mr. AMLIE. General Mitchell was presumably brought before the committee as an outstanding authority on the subject of aviation, and on the subject of dirigibles in particular. I understand he was in command of our aviation forces during the war.

Mr. SUTPHIN. He is no longer connected with the service. Mr. AMLIE. That is true.

Mr. SUTPHIN. Under what conditions or circumstances did he leave the service; is the gentleman aware?

Mr. SIROVICH. Will the gentleman yield for me to answer that?

Mr. AMLIE. I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. Sirovich].

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Amlie] has expired.

Mr. SIROVICH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be given 2 additional minutes that I may answer the question propounded by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. Sutphin].

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SIROVICH. General Mitchell stated the reason he left the Aviation Corps was because men were being sent up in flaming coffins and being murdered and burned alive, and that the airplanes they went up in were unfit for American patriotic boys to go up in. One billion six hundred million dollars had been spent and not one airplane was sent up that was fit for an American boy to be sent up in. That is the reason he resigned.

Mr. SUTPHIN. Is that the kind of airplane that is being used today?

Mr. SIROVICH. I do not know. I answered the gentleman's question. He asked why General Mitchell left the Service.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. AMLIE] has again expired.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. In view of what has been said with reference to the crews of the different dirigibles that have come to a terrible end, I think I should say that having spent 15 years' service upon the naval appropriations committee and having a thorough knowledge of what was done with reference to those crews, that no substantial change has been made in the crews of those dirigibles. When men were put upon those ships they were kept upon them and there were very few changes in the crews.

Now, with reference to the statement that has been made, I think that Congress should know that when General Mitchell was Assistant Chief of the Air Corps of the Army he personally approved the form, type, design and construction of every airplane that was built during the period in which he was Assistant Chief of the Air Corps.

I yield back the balance of my time.

The pro forma amendments were withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

Army transportation: For transportation of Army supplies; of authorized baggage, including packing and crating; of horse equipment; and of funds for the Army; for the purchase or construction, not to exceed $10,000 alterations, operation, and repair of boats and other vessels; for wharfage, tolls, and ferriage; for drayage and cartage; for the purchase, manufacture (including both material and labor), maintenance, hire, and repair of pack saddles and harness; for the purchase, hire, operation, maintenance, and repair of wagons, carts, drays, other vehicles, and horse-drawn and motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles required for the transportation of troops and supplies and for official military and garrison purposes; for hire of draft and pack animals; for travel allowances to officers of National Guard on discharge from Federal service as prescribed in the act of March 2, 1901 (U. S. C., title 10, sec. 751), and to enlisted men of National Guard on discharge from Federal service, as prescribed in amendatory act of September 22, 1922 (U. S. C., title 10, sec. 752), and to members of the National Guard who have been mustered into Federal service and discharged on account of physical disability; in all, $9,-191,981, of which amount not exceeding $250,000 shall be available immediately for the procurement and transportation of fuel for the service of the fiscal year 1936: Provided, That not to exceed $1,000,000 of this appropriation shall be available for the purchase or exchange of motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles and trucks, of which amount not to exceed $750 for light automobiles and $1,200 for medium automobiles, including the value of any vehicles exchanged, and not to exceed $750 for light automobiles and $1,200 for medium automobiles, including the value of any vehicles exchanged, and not to exceed $75000 may be expended for the purchase of rechange of motor-propelled ambulances and motorcycles: Provided further, That no appropriation contained in this act shall be available for my character

Mr. PARKS. Mr. Chairman, on page 23, line 19, after the figures "$10,000", I would like to offer an amendment to insert a comma, which was inadvertently left out.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the comma will be inserted at the place mentioned.

There was no objection. The Clerk read as follows:

HORSES, DRAFT AND PACK ANIMALS

For the purchase of draft and pack animals and horses within limits as to age, sex, and size to be prescribed by the Secretary of War for remounts for officers entitled to public mounts, for the United States Military Academy, and for such organizations and members of the military service as may be required to be mounted, and for all expenses incident to such purchases (including $72,155 for encouragement of the breeding of riding horses suitable for the Army, in cooperation with the Bureau of Animal Industry, Department of Agriculture, including the purchase of animals for breeding purposes and their maintenance), $222,155.

Mr. THOMASON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to express my appreciation to this committee for this section of the bill, and also to note the fact that probably the horse has found some friends once more on the War Department appropriation committee. In times past all the members of the committee were not so friendly. I realize and appreciate the value of airplanes and trucks and all the motorization and mechanization that we hear so much about these days, but I still contend that you cannot do without one of man's best friends, and that is the horse.

Until quite recently I represented a district that extended for more than 600 miles along the Mexican border, from El Paso nearly to San Antonio, including what is known as the "Big Bend" country of Texas. I still have in my district 300 miles of the Mexican border. I am the friend of the Cavalry branch of the Army. I know what they meant to my people in the Mexican raids of a few years ago. It is all right to talk about mechanization and motorization, but in that country down there, where there are no roads, and even if there were roads you could not go a half mile away from them, it is absolutely essential that we have cavalry. I am glad to know that there is an effort now being made by this committee to see to it that the Army does have sufficient horses and that it have good horses. In addition to that, I believe the farmers and ranchers of this country very heartily endorse a reasonable appropriation for the purchase of good, well-bred horses. Some of the finest men in the world are in the ranch business in my part of the country. Due to drought and depression they are hard pressed financially. Many of them have good horses, and this will provide a market for some of them.

As I said, I just wish to express my appreciation to this committee for the fact that the horse that we all love so much, I hope, is going to come back into his own. [Applause.]

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn. The Clerk read as follows:

BARRACKS AND QUARTERS AND OTHER BUILDINGS AND UTILITIES

For all expenses incident to the construction, installation, operation, and maintenance of buildings, utilities, appurtenances, and accessories necessary for the shelter, protection, and accommodation of the Army and its personnel and property, where not specifically provided for in other appropriations, including personal services, purchase and repair of furniture for quarters for officers, warrant officers, and noncommissioned officers, and officers' messes and wall lockers and refrigerators for Government-owned buildings as may be approved by the Secretary of War, care and improvement of grounds, flooring and framing for tents, rental of buildings, including not to exceed $900 in the District of Columbia, provided space is not available in Government-owned buildings, and grounds for military purposes and lodgings for recruits and applicants for enlistments, water supply, sewer and fire-alarm systems, fire apparatus, roads, walks, wharves, drainage, dredging channels, purchase of water, disposal of sewage, shooting galleries, ranges for smallarms target practice, field, mobile, and railway artillery practice, including flour for paste for marking targets, such ranges and galleries to be open as far as practicable to the National Guard and organized rific clubs under regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of War; warehouse and fuel-handling equipment; stoves required for use of the Army for heating offices, hospitals, barracks, quarters, recruiting stations, and United States disciplinary barracks, also ranges and stoves for cooking food at posts, for post bakery and bake-oven equipment and apparatus and appliances for cooking and serving food when constituting fixed installations in buildings, including maintenance and repair of such heating and cooking appliances; for furnishing heat and light for the authorized allowance of quarters for officers, enlisted men, and warrant officers, including retired enlisted men when ordered to active duty, contract surgeons when stationed at and occupying public quarters at military posts, officers of the National Guard attending service and garrison schools, and for recruits, guards, hospitals, storehouses, offices, the buildings erected at private cost, in the operation of the act approved May 31, 1902 (U. S. C., title 10, sec. 1346), and buildings for a similar purpose on military reservations authorized by War Department regulations; for sale of fuel to officers; fuel and engine supplies required in the operation of modern batteries at established posts, $10,049,104, and $2,500,000 of this appropriation shall be available immediately for the procurement and transportation of fuel for the service of the fiscal year 1936: Provided, That not more than $16,000 of the appropriations contained in this act shall be available for rent of offices outside the District of Columbia in connection with work incident to the assurance of adequate provision for the mobilization of matériel and industrial organizations essential to war-time needs: Provided further, That this appropriation shall be available for the rental of offices, garages, and stables for military attachés: Provided further, That no part of the funds herein appropriated shall be available for construction of a permanent nature of an additional building or an extension or addition to an existing building, the cost of which in any case exceeds $20,000: Provided further, That the monthly rental rate to be paid out of this appropriation for stabling any animal shall not exceed $10.

Mr. MAVERICK. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Maverick: Page 28, line 4, after the word "posts", strike out "$10,049,104" and insert "$16,049,104."

Mr. MAVERICK. Mr. Chairman, when this bill was brought out the chairman of the subcommittee, the distinguished gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. Parks], stated that—

The Budget allowance is less than one-fourth of 1 percent for maintenance per annum. Even with the increase the committee is recommending the amount is ridiculously low. Of course, it might be that some reconditioning funds may be allotted from recovery funds, but that is entirely problematical at this time.

I am going to show certain official figures of the War Department, which show that the maintenance of the Army has ordinarily been from $6,000,000 to $10,000,000 per annum. Even pacifists are willing that a soldier have safe, clean, well-repaired housing to live in. This is merely for maintenance of barracks, quarters, and other buildings. It is not directly military, but for maintenance of decent housing.

The depreciation of buildings of all kinds over the United States runs from 3 to 7 percent. The value of all military buildings in this country is $500,000,000—although I will put it at $400,000,000—I notice that the figure given by the chairman as original cost was $176,000,000, but even with his figure, it is ridiculously low, to use his own words.

I say, in all seriousness, that we have a large investment, a large military investment, and, further, I speak from personal experience, because I have inspected a large amount of the military property of the United States. This property is depreciating very rapidly; the buildings are not being painted, repaired, plastered, or kept up. The worst thing about it is that civilian laborers who have been doing this work for upward of 25 years, and who thought they had lifetime jobs, have been displaced, and this work is now being done by soldiers. Soldiers were not employed to be laborers. Let them go back to their duty of being soldiers instead of forcing them to be plumbers, plasterers, and to do all kinds of labor. I believe we should put the civilian laborers back to work.

I have figures here from the United States Bureau, called "Preliminary Report on Depreciation Studies", showing depreciation allowable at from 2 to 6½ percent per annum. Other authorities place depreciation on various buildings at from 3 to 7 percent. Many of our buildings are very old and therefore have a high rate of depreciation. It is a correct policy, I think, to have a large building program, such as the P. W. A., but it is false economy to let our present buildings depreciate and fall into decay. It is very unlikely that any money will be allocated for ordinary maintenance, hence we should provide it.

The amount of increase which I offer is proportionately very small and much less than the usual depreciation. If it amounted to 3 percent of $500,000,000 it would be $15,000,000; and if it amounted to 7 percent it would come to $35,000,000. So this amount of $6,000,000, although somewhat above the recommendation, is a fair amount and ought to be allowed for the maintenance of the Military Establishment.

Mr. CULKIN. I understand this bill carries these sums just for maintenance, not for any additional or new housing.

Mr. MAVERICK. No; there is not to be any new housing on the appropriation. As I understand it, something like $900,000 has been allowed for maintenance. I ask the gentleman from Arkansas if my understanding is correct?

Mr. PARKS. Yes.

Mr. MAVERICK. Nine hundred thousand dollars is included in the bill for maintenance. So the whole amount, as shown by the amendment I have submitted, would be $6,900,000 for maintenance.

The chairman of the subcommittee says himself that he does not know whether we are going to get it from P. W. A. I do not think so either. Past practices have been to build new buildings. These, in turn, bring new costs. In my own district a beautiful officers' club was built which gave some temporary work, yet the general buildings in that military establishment have been left in terrible shape. In fact, besides depreciating so rapidly, many are dangerous to life.

The matter of maintaining the Military Establishment is just a common, ordinary routine duty. The more we neglect it, the more we allow it to depreciate, the more it will cost in the end to get it back into shape. I am informed it would take something like $14,000,000 or $15,000,000 to restore it. So this $6,000,000 is a comparatively small amount.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and to include therein a table with reference to maintenance of the Army.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Note.—The barracks and quarters' appropriation covers various projects, of which a number represent fixed charges which cannot be appreciably reduced, such as fuel, light and power, operating supplies, incandescent lamps, removal of garbage, purchase of water, rentals, key operating personnel, and the procurement of equipment. The remaining projects cover repair and alteration of buildings and utilities. The figures submitted above represent the funds that were available for these latter purposes.

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment in order to ask a question or two of the chairman of the subcommittee. I am interested in the question of military housing, and am frank to say I am not clear as to just how far the bill goes.

Mr. PARKS. We have not made any appropriations for housing for the Army since 1933. This bill does not carry any money for housing. The appropriation we are now considering of slightly more than $10,000,000, which is $500,000 more than the Budget estimate, is, among other things, for maintenance and repair of military posts under the jurisdiction of the Quartermaster General.

Mr. CULKIN. That is simply for maintenance of existing structures.

Mr. PARKS. Yes; it is not for new construction.

Mr. CULKIN. But there is no specific item for housing. Mr. PARKS. No.

Mr. CULKIN. Has not such an item always been carried in the military appropriation bill?

Mr. PARKS. Not for several years; as I said, not since 1933. Before that we carried funds for the housing program to the extent of several million dollars a year.

Mr. CULKIN. It is being done now by the P. W. A., or whatever body may succeed it.

Mr. PARKS. Yes. Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the House and of the committee to a condition that exists in two of the posts in my own district. In one of the posts, Fort Ontario, at Oswego, N. Y., a battalion post where there is now quartered a brigade headquarters, the headquarters company has preempted the entire post exchange. so the men have no recreational facilities. This building was not constructed for a barracks and is utterly unsuited for the purpose. The noncommissioned staff of the brigade headquarters are quartered in buildings that were built about the time of the Mexican War, wooden structures, extremely dangerous; and, of course, not fireproof. Other construction is needed for housing and drill purposes if the enlisted men are to maintain their morale.

The other post, Madison Barracks, at Sackets, N. Y., a regimental post, has $60,000 of modern equipment that is insufficiently protected. Hospitalization and other housing is needed. Both these posts are used by the National Guard and the C. C. C. Their activities have greatly increased. I have called the attention of the Quartermaster General and the Army authorities generally to this situation, but there is no relief from it. They properly pass the "buck" to Congress. I desire to call the attention of Congress to the situation in these two posts, a condition that is crying to heaven for relief. A soldier must have a dignified environment if he is to be a good soldier; his pay is small; the environment is what helps out the situation.

I trust that the P. W. A., or whatever mysterious agency succeeds the P. W. A., or however it is born, will see that these men and this equipment are given adequate housing.

Mr. MAVERICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULKIN. I yield.

Mr. MAVERICK. The P. W. A., as a rule, makes capital investment; they put up a building; they do not maintain the building or have any current expenditures. The purpose of this amendment is to provide current expenditures to maintain the old buildings.

Mr. CULKIN. I understand that. This bill does not carry any appropriation for new structures or new housing.

Mr. MAVERICK. Nor do I think it carries sufficient appropriation for proper maintenance. In the words of the committee chairman, it is a ridiculously small amount.

Mr. CULKIN. I emphasize again, Mr. Chairman, the necessity of giving the enlisted men in the American service decent and dignified housing. It is an essential part of their

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. Chairman, I have a Cavalry school in my district, so I join with the gentleman from Texas in expressing appreciation for the rehabilitation of the old horse and bringing that noble animal back into the Army.

While the newspapers are heralding this bill as the second largest war-appropriation bill we have ever passed, nevertheless, we are letting our Army posts all over the country go to wrack and ruin. This committee must not misunderstand the proposition and think that $9,000,000 or $10,-000,000 is being appropriated for maintenance of Army buildings; only some $800,000 out of that amount has been provided for maintenance.

Fort Fort Riley, in my district, with a valuation of $12,000,-000 comprised largely of buildings, in 1930 there was provided $348,265 for maintenance; that is, for plastering, painting, fixing floors, repairs of roofs, and so forth; whereas last year only $47,246 was allowed. The amount that was originally recommended to this committee for this year was $383,800 for all the Army posts in the United States, and there are several hundred of them; practically the same amount as was allowed to this one big Army post back in

In 1933 there was $3,403,437 allotted for maintenance and repair of buildings, which went down to $600,245 for 1935.

I appeared before the war appropriation committee and they gave me a very courteous hearing. They also heard other gentlemen who appeared before them for this same purpose, and they increased the allotment $500,000, which I appreciate very much, but it is not nearly enough.

General Bash, the Quartermaster General, stated before the hearings that they should have at least between $6,000,000 and $8,000,000 to put these buildings back into a proper state of repair. He stated that a year or two ago they made a survey, and at that time it was shown by the inventory that it would require $10,000,000 to restore the posts to a proper degree of maintenance, and on the last survey that it would take $20,000,000 for the same purpose.

Yesterday I asked the gentleman from California [Mr. DOCKWEILER], a member of the committee, what he thought about it, as follows: "Does the gentleman think there has been enough allowed to take care of this repair work which the gentleman just mentioned in the posts all over the

The gentleman from California [Mr. Dockweiler] answered: "No; I do not think so. I am convinced it is not. I wish the President would spend some of the Public Works' money in rehabilitating these places."

Day before yesterday the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BoL-TON] explained that the P. W. A. money was only used to construct new buildings, and he explained further that there was some $400,000,000 invested in these properties, and it has been brought out here that the amount allotted for maintenance was less than one-fourth of 1 percent.

Mr. LUCKEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARPENTER. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. LUCKEY. Is it not a fact that most of the deficiency, waste, and loss in getting these buildings in condition is due to mismanagement, and is it not further a fact that in 1932 the Army sold goods costing $9,155,000 for something like $697,000?

Mr. CARPENTER. That is not true of the Army post in my district, I may say to the gentleman. They do not have money enough to keep the roofs over the buildings there.

Mr. Chairman, I ask permission to include as a part of my remarks the statement I made before the committee. It is just a short statement.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

There was no objection.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 5, 1935.

FORT RILEY, KANS., MILITARY RESERVATION

STATEMENT OF HON. RANDOLPH CARPENTER, A REPRESENTATIVE IN CONGRESS FROM THE STATE OF KANSAS

Mr. Parks. Mr. Carpenter, we will be glad to hear you at this time.

Mr. Carpenter. Mr. Chairman, and gentlemen of the committee, I am appearing in regard to Fort Riley, which is in my congressional district.

Fort Riley is one of the most important of all the military reservations in the United States, and where is located the Government's largest and principal Cavalry school. It is located within the State of Kansas and my district.

The value of this project as a whole, the principal part of which includes the buildings erected thereon, is of the approximate value of $12,000,000. It is, therefore, necessary that sufficient funds be provided for repairing, maintaining, and upkeep of this establishment.

The amount provided by the Government a few years ago was one $300,000 yearly for such maintenance. There has been a The amount provided by the Government a few years ago was some $300,000 yearly for such maintenance. There has been a reduction each year of approximately $50,000 on this amount until it has now been reduced to below $50,000.

The following is a statement of General Lott, commandant of the Cavalry School.

I might say, Mr. Chairman, that this information is contained in a letter. Of course, as you understand, Army officers are a little bit reluctant about giving out information. The officer gave me this information because he has the public interest there at heart.

They are always very reticent about giving out any information.

I am now quoting from his statement:

"The allotment for maintenance and repair was the smallest this post has received since the World War, amounting to approximately $50,000, which, as you know, is very little indeed for a $12,000,000 project."

I further quote to the committee from a letter of C. G. Harvey.

I further quote to the committee from a letter of C. G. Harvey, colonel, Quartermaster Corps, assistant, dated January 30, 1935, as

The quartermaster states that at the present time, mainterice quartermaster states that at the present time, maintenance and repair funds at his station are not sufficient to retain even the permanent employees, 50 percent of whom are on furlough without pay at all times."

These two statements show the condition of the fort at this time in regard to the funds allowed for maintenance.

While I appreciate the fact that these funds are appropriated in a lump sum by the Government and allotted by the Quartermaster Corps, I wish to urge the committee in making this appropriation to designate or otherwise indicate the amount of such appropriation that should be allotted to Fort Riley for this work.

In this connection I am submitting the following items that have been furnished me by these in command at Fort Riley or have been furnished me by those in command at Fort Riley as necessary at this time:

Repair of roofs on Government buildings Painting of Government buildings, inside and out______ New floors for officers' and noncommissioned officers' 125,000 quarters__ 45,000

POST EXCHANGES

I would like to make one other statement: I have heard the discussion here today on the subject of post exchanges. As a Member of Congress I am opposed to any extension of this service by the post exchanges that will permit them to encroach upon private business.

I thank you for this opportunity to appear.

Mr. Parks. We will give the matter you present our careful consideration.

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. Chairman, I want to say further that regular civilian employees who are under the civil service have been employed for many years at Fort Riley, and who have remained at these jobs during the prosperous years instead of seeking more lucrative positions, have recently been discharged or put on half time, and if they received any work at all, they worked one month and were furloughed the next without pay, so that they have been working 50 percent and less of the time.

These men, as it must be remembered, having been regularly employed for years back, because of their familiarity with the buildings and the work to be done, can more economically maintain the buildings and keep them in repair than by discharging them and bringing in a totally new force later on; and if they keep on cutting the forces down as they have the past year or two, they will not have anyone there regularly employed to keep up the post.

Mr. WEARIN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

Mr. WEARIN. Mr. Chairman, I listened with great interest to some recent remarks on the part of my good friend the distinguished gentleman from Texas and a number of others with reference to the dirigible program in the United States. It is my intention at sometime in the very near future to address the House upon this question in an authoritative manner, when I have completed the preparation of some facts and data that I believe will be of interest.

Some statements were made during the course of this colloguy that I think should be elucidated a little bit. Preliminary to that I want to call attention to the fact that there are few people today in public life who say that the dirigible is absolutely impossible as a mechanical engineering structure, but it certainly has not proved practical as an instrument of military defense. Furthermore, the Government of the United States has spent many millions of dollars fruitlessly in an effort to construct one which can withstand a little storm or squall. It is about time, in the opinion of many people who are paying the taxes of this country, that private enterprise be permitted to go on with the experiment from this point.

It is rather strange that all of the money we have spent in the last few years in these enterprises has come to the same end. I refer to the Shenandoah, the Roma, which was an Italian-built, American-purchased ship, the Akron, and the Macon. That, of course, does not include a considerable number of blimps, one of which went down searching for the Akron. Many others have been destroyed under various

These pertinent thoughts call to mind the fact that our experience with the operation of dirigibles has been, to say the least, rather unfortunate. I was interested, and I wish the policy of the House would permit me to insert in my remarks at this time some editorials from the New York Sun, to which the Washington Post devoted a full page on February 15, 1935, because they were very enlightening, with reference to what we have vainly and extravagantly attempted to accomplish in this particular field. During the course of this discussion a few minutes ago someone said "America ought to be able to do what other countries are doing", or words to that effect. What other countries? Germany is the only country that I know of that has endeavored to proceed with any degree of rapidity with the development of dirigibles. We have heard a lot of late through the beating of publicity tom-toms they are in the process of constructing new ships of that type, but to date none of them have appeared and they are still in the business of navigating the Graf Zeppelin.

I want you to keep this in mind, when we are constructing ships for the defense of this country or agencies of any description for the defense of the Nation: We should keep in mind the percentage of effectiveness that is to be obtained from the investment involved, and that is what I am going to go into in detail when I address the House a little later upon this subject. I could not permit this opportunity to go by and this Record to go to press without inserting these

Now, with reference to the navigation of the Graf Zeppelin, it is true it has proceeded with a good deal of success; but it is also true, if you will watch and observe the progress of that ship, that the navigator of it is very careful not to advance her into a storm area of any severity. I would remind you that as she crossed the United States, when she was here upon her visit, he frequently diverted her course several hundred miles to escape a storm area, and he did not at any time, or only upon rare occasions, say he would arrive definitely at a certain place at a certain time and via a definite route, because the navigator of that ship knew only too well its vulnerability.

I stated on the floor of this House about a year ago that if the Macon ever got into a bad squall she would come to the same end as the Akron a year and a half or 2 years ago, and that is exactly what happened, but with even less than a squall. I predict the same thing with reference to other ships of the same type if they are navigated into storm areas.

Did you ever stop to think that a mere dew on the surface of one of those envelopes enclosing the framework of a dirigible will add a weight of 8 or 10 tons to the lifting capacity of the ship, and the effectiveness of the implement is gauged by its capacity to lift and carry implements of defense, as has been said by some of the Members of this House.

Mr. DARDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEARIN. Yes. Mr. DARDEN. Does the gentleman propose at a later date to discuss the military effectiveness of lighter-than-air craft?

Mr. WEARIN. I do, in detail. [Applause.]

Mr. PARKS. Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment offered by my distinguished friend from Texas will not prevail. The committee gave a great deal of consideration to this question of maintenance, to such an extent that we went $500,000 above the Budget. I want to call the attention of the Committee to the fact that there is now pending before the Military Affairs Committee and, I believe, before a subcommittee presided over by the distinguished gentleman who is now presiding [Mr. Hill of Alabama] a measure under which it is intended to give this matter very intensive and thorough study, with a view to reporting a bill. That measure, according to the Chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, will be an indication of the congressional viewpoint as to allocations that may be made out of "recovery" money. That measure has relation to the bill just recently passed through the House appropriating nearly $5,000,000,000. Everybody here believes the bill eventually will become law, and I do not believe there is a man in this Congress but who is absolutely sure we are going to get a large amount of this money from the President, the exact amount to be determined by him, for construction of housing, fortifications, reconditioning, and so forth. I cannot say how much this will be, because I have no authority to make any such statement, but I am reasonably sure it will not be a sum of generous proportions; and in view of the amount we have in this bill and the amount that probably will be made available after the manner I have indicated, I hope you will not vote for this amendment.

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. PARKS. I yield.

Mr. CULKIN. The bill, as I understand it, provides $900,-000 for maintenance?

Mr. PARKS. About that for buildings alone.

Mr. CULKIN. And the amendment of the gentleman from Texas adds $6,000,000 to the total amount of the appropriation.

Mr. PARKS. Yes.

Mr. CULKIN. I have here the hearings of the committee. page 264, where General Bash states in substance that the average amount for maintenance and repair is somewhat over $3,400,000. The gentleman is more familiar with this subject than I am.

Mr. PARKS. I think it was in 1933 that approximately $3,400,000 was allocated to the maintenance and repair of buildings. That amount has been diminishing ever since, because recovery funds have been available and because the new buildings we have do not require the same amount for repairing as formerly.

Mr. CULKIN. And, of course, the gentleman is relying on the good will of the P. W. A., or whatever agency may succeed it. May I make this suggestion to the gentleman: Will not the gentleman consent to accept the amendment of the distinguished gentleman from Texas making it $3,000,000 additional instead of $6,000,000? This instead of speculating on what will come out of the $4.800.000,000.

Mr. PARKS. I do not think there is any speculation

Mr. CULKIN. The gentleman stated he did not know about what would be available nor how.

Mr. PARKS. I am going to tell the gentleman now if he will allow me just a moment.

There is one fact we are overlooking in connection with this $4,800,000,000. That has no effect upon our current revenues and no effect upon the Budget, but if we add $6,000,000 to a Budget that we have already exceeded by $5,000,000, we are going to unbalance it absolutely when everybody in the United States practically is demanding that we balance the Budget if it is possible to do so. This $4,800,-000,000 will not be paid for now, as everybody knows. This will come out of a bond issue, but if you continue to upset the regular Budget with various amendments when we only have about 50 Members present, you may create a situation whereby we will not be able to sell these bonds, and it is for this reason that I am urging you to stay within the bounds of the Budget. Of course, we are all interested in our local projects and the matters that come up around our homes, and we try to protect them; but we must try to keep within the Budget.

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKS. I yield.

Mr. CARPENTER. Up to this time, there has been very | little P. W. A. money available for maintenance.

Mr. PARKS. For the present year that is true, but they have got quite a sum out of C. W. A. and P. W. A. prior to this year.

Mr. CULKIN. How does the gentleman distinguish the money under this bill and the bond issues for the P. W. A. or its successor? Do they not both come out of the Treasury?

Mr. PARKS. Yes; but they come out of the Treasury in a different way.

Mr. CULKIN. There are no hidden sources of revenue. Mr. PARKS. What I am trying to explain is that the regular Budget is expected to represent current expenses to be paid out of the revenues accruing in the same fiscal year, while these bonds, like the bonus, if you pay it, will come due at some future time out of revenue from other sources to be determined upon later.

Mr. CULKIN. I would like to ask the gentleman one more question-the gentleman has been very kind so far. Has the gentleman any very definite information that the P. W. A. or its successor will give sufficient money to construct additional housing buildings and provide for their maintenance?

Mr. PARKS. I am not authorized to say it, but I think that is what is going to be done.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken; and the amendment was rejected. The Clerk read as follows:

HOSPITAL CARE, CANAL ZONE GARRISONS

For paying the Panama Canal such reasonable charges, exclusive For paying the Panama Canai such reasonable charges, exclusive of subsistence, as may be approved by the Secretary of War for caring in its hospitals for officers, enlisted men, military prisoners, and civilian employees of the Army admitted thereto upon the request of proper military authority, $40,000: Provided, That the subsistence of the said patients, except commissioned officers, shall be paid to said hospitals out of the appropriation for subsistence of the Army at the rates provided therein for commutation of rations for enlisted patients in general hospitals.

Mr. SAUTHOFF. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. This appropriation relating to hospital and medical care is about the only appropriation in the entire bill with which I am in sympathy. These huge increases in the Army appropriations will be followed by others in the naval appropriations. Then we will find that there will be chiseling of the P. W. A. and the C. C. C. and other activities of some more hundreds of millions of dollars until we have an increase in our Military and Naval Establishments of $1,000,000,000.

My purpose in raising an objection to any such huge increase is this. If we have plenty of money I might see some sense in it, but when we are advised by the newspapers, as we were last night, that 5,000 public schools in the United States will have to close by March 1 because they will not have sufficient funds to continue their operation, and while there are 1,300 more in addition to the 5,000 schools that would have to close by April 1 because of insufficient funds, I think it is high time for us seriously to consider whether or not we are justified in spending such huge increases for naval and military affairs, while we neglect the little children in learning how to read and write.

I feel that we should cut down some of these huge appropriations so that we might well provide that money for our educational affairs. We are advised that there will be necessary about $300,000,000 to help maintain the public schools of the United States until the end of this school year.

How are we going to do it? My idea is that we should take it out of these huge appropriations for the Army and the Navy; that we should allocate some of this money for the benefit of the educational department.

In addition to that, what is the situation in the North Central States, where our dairy herds have been slaughtered and have died for the lack of food? The last thing that many of our farmers have left to depend upon for any cash money is a small milk check, and we do not have the fodder to feed cattle in order that the cattle may survive. In Wisconsin, Minnesota, and the Dakotas they are giving us $24.99 to feed a basic herd of not less than 10 cows. You cannot even buy 1 ton of hay for less than $30. How can they exist? They are losing their homes and losing their cattle; they do not have enough money with which to buy seed to raise a crop this year, and still we scatter away a billion dollars. There is $60,000,000 increase in this bill alone over last year and there will be other increases all along the line.

I feel, Mr. Chairman, that there is a solemn obligation on our part to discharge our duty to our citizens and not drive them all out on the relief department in order that we may lift the appropriations to the military and naval forces to the extent of $1,000,000,000. [Applause.]

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

For repairs and improvements of ordnance establishments, and to meet such unforeseen expenditures as accidents or other contingencies may require, $1,068,186, of which amount there shall be available immediately $265,368 for the restoration of roofs to magazines at Raritan Arsenal.

Mr. DARDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I wish to call attention to a situation that exists in my district with reference to ammunition depots. There are two ammunition depots in the Second District of Virginia, one at St. Julians Creek, the naval depot, and the other, the Nansemond ordnance depot, an Army station. Unfortunately, when the Nansemond ordnance depot was created a few years ago, the wage scales were set much below those existing at the naval ammunition depot at St. Julians

I have in mind what the chairman of the subcommittee says about not increasing the appropriation carried in this bill, but I would like to ask the gentleman if he does not feel that it would be possible, within the present appropriation, to make some readjustment of the present wage scales at the Nansemond ordnance depot, to bring them more nearly in line with the pay schedules existing at St. Julians Creek?

Mr. PARKS. Is that the same matter which the gentleman spoke to me about recently?

Mr. DARDEN. It is. Mr. PARKS. The truth of the matter is, Mr. Chairman, I cannot see why they cannot find that money. I think it is an injustice to those men who are working there getting 65 or 70 cents a day less than men doing similar work in the naval ammunition depot a few miles away. Does that answer the gentleman?

Mr. DARDEN. Yes; it does. I wish to advise the gentleman that I have taken it up with the Chief of Ordnance, and he tells me that he feels the money can be found in the present appropriation to make the adjustment.

Mr. PARKS. I do not think there is any doubt about it.

Mr. McMILLAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DARDEN. I yield.

Mr. McMILLAN. I simply desire to say to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. DARDEN] and to the chairman of the subcommittee that it seems to me that is a matter of policy that should apply with equal force to all of these ordnance depots, whether they are located in Virginia or any other section of the country.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to page 8 in order to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. KELLER. I offer an amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Keller: On page 8, line 18, before the period, insert a comma and "and in addition, not to exceed $35,000 may be transferred to this appropriation from other ap-propriations contained in this act to be used exclusively for or on account of preserving Government-owned moving-picture films having historical value."

Mr. PARKS. Mr. Chairman, as far as I am personally concerned, I have no objection to the amendment. I think those films are valuable and should be preserved. The amendment occasions no increase to the bill.

Mr. KELLER. I thank the gentleman very much.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Keller].

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For expenses, selected officers and enlisted men, military service, schools, including medical and hospital treatment authorized by law, $450,209.

Committee amendment: Page 46, line 21, after the word "service", strike out the comma.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

ORGANIZED RESERVES

For pay and allowances of members of the Officers' Reserve Corps on active duty in accordance with law; mileage, reimbursement of actual traveling expenses, or per diem allowances in lieu thereof, as authorized by law: Provided, That the mileage allowance to members of the Officers' Reserve Corps when called into active service for training for 15 days or less shall not exceed 4 cents per mile; pay, transportation, subsistence, clothing, and medical and hospital treatment of members of the Enlisted Reserve Corps; conducting correspondence or extension courses for instruction of members of the Reserve Corps, including necessary supplies, procurement of maps and textbooks, and transportation and travelling expenses of employees; purchase of training manuals, including Government publications and blank forms, subscriptions to magazines and periodicals of a professional or technical nature; establishment, maintenance, and operation of divisional and regimental headquarters and of camps for training of the Organized Reserves; for miscellaneous expenses incident to the administration of the Organized Reserves, including the maintenance and operation of motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles; for the actual and necessary expenses, or per diem in lieu thereof, at rates authorized by law, incurred by officers and enlisted men of the Regular Army traveling on duty in connection with the Organized Reserves; for expenses incident to the use, including upkeep and depreciation costs, of supplies, equipment, and materiel furnished in accordance with law from stocks under the control of the War Department, except that not to exceed $845,725 of this appropriation shall be available for expenditure by the Chief of the Air Corps for the production and purchase of new airplanes and their equipment, spare parts, and accessories; for transportation of baggage, including packing and crating, of Reserve officers ordered to active duty for not less than 6 months; for the medical and hospital treatment of members of the Officers' R

Mr. ANDREWS of New York. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Andrews of New York: Page 52, line 19, after the word "headquarters", insert a new paragraph to read: "For such additional sums as may be necessary under this and other appropriations contained in this act to defray the cost of calling into active service at the direction of the President, who is hereby directed to call into active service, with their consent, for a period of not more than 1 year for any one officer, not to exceed at any time 2,000 Reserve officers of the combatant arms, for active duty with the Regular Army: Provided, That members of the Officers' Reserve Corps so called to active service shall be distributed as nearly as may be practicable among the said combatant arms in proportion to the commissioned strength of such arms and service, and shall be apportioned in grades therein, so far as possible, as follows: Not to exceed 5 percent in the field grades, 20 percent in the grade of captain, 35 percent in the grade of first lieutenant, and 40 percent in the grade of second lieutenant: Provided further, That no Reserve officer shall be called to active service under the provisions of this section who is more than 45 years old at the time of such call: And provided further, That nothing herein contained shall affect the number of Reserve officers that may be called to active duty under existing laws nor the conditions under and purposes for which they may be so called."

Mr. PARKS. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the amendment, for I assume the gentleman desires to discuss his amendment. Mr. ANDREWS of New York. Mr. Chairman, this amendment represents substantially the verbiage of section 3 in the so-called "Thomason bill", of which you have heard before today. This provided for a certain increase of officers in the Air Corps, for an increase in the enlisted strength of the Army, and contained provision for calling annually not to exceed 2,000 officers of the Reserve Corps for training in the Regular Army for periods not to exceed 1 year.

I want to again remind the Members of the House that there are approximately 7,000 officers graduating each year from our colleges and their R. O. T. C. schools throughout the country. We have heard a good deal about providing for an additional cadet from each district at West Point, but may I point out to you the fact that even though we appoint an additional cadet to the Military Academy, it will be 4 years at least before he is available for Army service. A very large number of the present Reserve Officers are unemployed at the present time, a great many more of them in each congressional district than there can be possible cadets at West Point.

This amendment is in keeping with the distinct recommendation made by General Pershing, by ex-Secretary of War Baker, and by General MacArthur to your Military Committee. It is an economic way to bring into the service by rotation for Regular Army training young men graduating from R. O. T. C. schools today, and particularly those who because of its provision that the majority must be selected from those in the grade of second lieutenant would have the greatest expectancy of future service and value to the country.

We must look at this from the standpoint not only of preparedness but also from the standpoint of relief for the unemployed. Many of these R. O. T. C. Reserve officers are unemployed today and have nothing to do. We might well take the best of them into the Regular Army for periods of between 6 months and 1 year.

I believe this amendment deserves the support of the House. It is a part of the bill which has the unqualified approval of the Military Affairs Committee, a measure which was adopted by that committee unanimously.

Mr. PARKS. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state the point of order.

Mr. PARKS. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment constitutes legislation on an appropriation bill

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. ANDREWS of New York. Mr. Chairman, I am not very well versed on the rules or in parliamentary procedure, but it has been well said here that the President is the commanding officer of the Army. It seems to me that he is authorized to call into service Reserve officers. Beyond that, we are calling into active service today Reserve officers not only for the Regular Army but for extra duty with the C. C. C. camps. This bill as written makes provision for calling Reserve officers to active duty. It seems to me this is merely an expansion of the powers which already exist.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The Chair will state that an examination of the language of the amendment shows clearly that the amendment is legislation; that it is in no sense a limitation of an appropriation, and it is therefore out of order.

The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. PARKS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. Hill of Alabama, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 5913, the War Department appropriation bill, 1936, had come to no resolution thereon.

RESOLUTION FROM THE LEGISLATURE OF PUERTO RICO

Mr. IGLESIAS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for I minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the Resident Commissioner from Puerto Rico?

There was no objection.

Mr. IGLESIAS. Mr. Speaker, I have received a resolution from the Legislature of Puerto Rico, which I desire to call to the attention of the House. In view of the lateness of the hour I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and to include therein this resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the Resident Commissioner from Puerto Rico?

There was no objection.

Mr. IGLESIAS. Mr. Speaker, I have received from the Legislature of Puerto Rico a resolution which contains petitions sent to the President regarding conditions in the island, which, in all justice, should be remedied.

The conditions to which I refer are set forth in this resolution. The Puerto Rican sugar industry is not only suffering from an abnormal situation but also is being punished by not as yet having received a satisfactory agreement whereby the sugar employers and the workers in general are compensated for the terrible cuts in production in the island, in spite of the fact that the Jones-Costigan Act in substance provides, under section 15 (f), that the Secretary of Agriculture shall use and spend the processing taxes collected on Puerto Rican sugar for the benefit of Puerto Rican agriculture. So far, Puerto Rico, as this resolution states, has not received fair and just treatment.

Franklin Delano Roosevelt, to urge effective and immediate action in regard to the disposal of the surplus sugar produced in 1934, the fixing of individual quotas, and the final delineation of the program for the 1935 crop; and that provisions benefiting the 60,000 unemployed agricultural and factory workers be adopted, as well as other measures that should be adopted by the Agricultural Adjustment Administration of the Federal Government, and for other purposes", which was unanimously approved by the for other purposes", which was unanimously approved by the Senate of Puerto Rico on February 14, 1935, and by the House of Representatives on February 15, 1935.

NATIONAL DEFENSE

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including therein an address delivered by myself over the radio last evening.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio address, delivered over the Columbia Broadcasting System by Representative Robert Ramspeck, Democrat, of Georgia, Wednesday, February 20, at 11:15 p. m. Representative Rams-PECK spoke under the auspices of the Reserve Officers' Association of the United States as part of the celebration of National Defense Week. His topic was "National Defense." He spoke from the studios of WJSV, Columbia's station for the Nation's Capital.

It is a privilege to have a part in the celebration of National Defense Week under the auspices of the Reserve Officers' Association of the United States.

This splendid organization is composed of approximately 90,000 of America's finest citizens, who, because of their love of country and of the lessons brought to us in the World War, devote many hours each year toward fitting themselves for service to our Nation in the event of an emergency.

They receive pay only when on active duty. Since the average pay is only $19.17 per year, they could not be charged with having selfish interest in what they are doing.

The Organized Reserves, under our plan of defense, are to provide immediately trained officers for an expanded Army if an emergency should occur.

gency should occur.

We owe to this fine group the thanks of all of America for their unselfish devotion to the duty for which they have volunteered.

The United States is essentially a peace-loving Nation. Since the World War our Presidents have continuously endeavored to promote peace among the nations of the earth.

We have joined in conferences for the purpose of bringing about disarmament; we have actually destroyed naval vessels and curtailed our defense program as an example to others; have made agreements for the curtailment of implements of war, only to see these agreements abrogated and all our peace efforts spurned to a great extent by the other nations

In Georgia we have a great and godly man who has for many years faithfully served humanity as a bishop of the Methodist faith. In a newspaper article he once expressed sympathy with peace societies, but observed that the hope of peace on earth could rest only in the hearts and souls of the peoples of this earth. This great churchman was correct. This great churchman was correct all hope and work for peace in the United States, but we had

We all hope and work for peace in the United States, but we had very little encouragement from the nations of Europe.

When Armistice Day arrived on November 11, 1918, the legions of the American Expeditionary Forces had turned the tide of that great world conflict into a victory for the Allied nations.

It is interesting to recall, however, that during our participation in the World War, we never fired an American cannon nor flew an American airplane. We went into that conflict totally unprepared, and many of our soldiers lost their lives because of our failure in this respect.

this respect.

Out of the conflict we learned the absolute necessity of having plans for an emergency and a trained personnel to cope with the

Thus in 1920 Congress enacted the National Defense Act, providing for the first time a plan in keeping with the advice of Washington, the father of our country.

Ington, the latner of our country.

This act provides for a small standing Army with three volunteer civilian components, the Organized Reserves, the National Guard, and the Reserve Officers' Training Corps.

This is a democratic and American plan of national defense. In it there is no danger of encouraging a spirit of militarism. It will, however, prevent—if carried out—our facing another emergency in the state of unpreparedness such as existed in 1917.

There are those who sincerally beligned that to prepare for national

There are those who sincerely believe that to prepare for national defense encourages war.

To them I would like to say that we have never been prepared even for national defense, and yet that fact did not prevent our becoming involved in the War of 1812, the Spanish War, or the becoming involved in the war of loss, the World War.

From my point of view it seems that it is beyond dispute that preparedness to enforce our rights would have prevented our being drawn into that terrible conflict of 1917 and 1918. Had Germany thought that we could train and transport to Europe an army large enough to turn the tide, that nation would not have drawn us into the Allied forces through violation of our rights.

Did you ever hear of anyone picking a quarrel with Jack Dempsey? Of course not. He is known to have the ability to defend himself

Did you ever hear of a safe blower trying to rob the safe in a police station? No; because it is adequately protected.

Did you ever hear of a firebug setting fire to the headquarters of a fire engine company? No; because it is equipped to put out fires. We people of the United States spend more money each year for fire insurance than we spend upon national defense.

We spend as much money for police protection as we do for national defense.

national defense.

Money spent upon our democratic plan of national defense is an investment for peace. It is insurance against the far greater cost of war.

In comparison with other nations our plan of national defense is a modest one. Those included in our plan consist of little more than a third of 1 percent of our population. In France the figure is 16½ percent, and in Italy 15½ percent, and in Russia almost 10 percent.

the figure is 16½ percent, and in Italy 15½ percent, and in Russia almost 10 percent.

While we have been trying by example to persuade the nations to disarm our Navy has dropped from second to third in rank.

In our own country we are faced not only with those sincere advocates of peace, who—mistakenly, I think—believe it can be promoted by not maintaining adequate forces for defense, but we now face the Communist agitator, who endeavors to instill into the minds of our people the false doctrines of foreign lands.

Are we to sit idly by while the foreign agitator spills his false doctrines into the ears of those who suffer from economic distress? No; we should clearly put the facts before the loyal and peace-loving citizens of the United States in order that they may understand the falseness of these subservient statements.

Because our plan of national defense is in keeping with the history and traditions of America, because it is based upon the teachings of Washington, and because it is so designed as to guard against building up a spirit of militarism, I am glad to pay tribute to the members of the Reserve Officers' Association.

These men advocate adequate appropriations with which to carry out the National Defense Act.

I am glad also to commend the War Department subcommittee of the House Committee on Appropriations for the manner in which they have met this problem in the bill reported on yesterday, and which is now under consideration by the House of Representatives.

The bill makes adequate provision during the fiscal year 1936 for the Army and its commonent parts with the possible avenue.

The bill makes adequate provision during the fiscal year 1936 for the Army and its component parts, with the possible exception of the sum provided for the citizens' military training camps.

I regret that the committee did not provide for training a greater number of young men in these camps.

It is only in the citizens' military training camps that young men who do not have the opportunity of attending college can get the chance to attain a commission in the Organized Reserves.

The Organized Reserves are recruited from the R. O. T. C. of our colleges and universities, and from the C. M. T. camps. We must not neglect these camps for many reasons. They are places where all young men have a chance to participate in our system of national defense, no matter if they are not privileged to attend college

They are an important part of the plan and a valuable source from which the Organized Reserves get the men to be trained as officers for service in any emergency.

If an emergency should again face the United States, and we

If an emergency should again face the United States, and we all hope that no such thing will happen, under our plan for defense, 87 percent of the officers of the Army would be drawn from the reserves—and yet the appropriation for the reserves constitutes only 1.1 percent of the total spent for national defense. Our plan of national defense was drafted by patriotic citizens of our Nation after the World War. It was enacted by Congress after careful study and consideration. We should not do less than it calls for, and Congress should provide the appropriations with which to carry out its provisions.

it calls for, and Congress should provide the appropriations with which to carry out its provisions.

In this time of stress and uncertainty in our country, do you not agree with me in the belief that it is the part of wisdom to be prepared for any possible emergency?

I share with my fellow citizens an earnest desire to see the nations of the world join in all sincere efforts toward the settlement of differences by peaceful methods. I applaud the efforts of those actively and sincerely working toward this end, while I condemn the disloyal who preach against our institutions and endeavor to destroy the foundations upon which our forefathers erected this great Nation.

It is in this spirit that I speak tonight for a policy—for a national policy of adequate preparedness for an emergency, coupled with a sincere desire to live in harmony and understanding with those of other nations.

Under the wise leadership of Washington and his associates of

Under the wise leadership of Washington and his associates of that era was established this powerful Nation as a haven for a peace-loving people, but to maintain the freedom which our fore-fathers won with their blood we must keep the faith and be prepared to repel any invasion of our lands, or any infringement of our pared to repel any invasion of our lands, or any infringement of our dearly beloved liberty.

For those to whom we are indebted for the founding of this Nation where the masses enjoy greater liberty than do those of any other country, I am grateful. They gave to you and to me a heritage in which we rejoice. The least we can do in their memory is to be always prepared to defend that which they gave us. We will do that, I am sure, but we cannot do so unless we join with our fellows in all sections of this Nation in supporting our patriotic young men, such as compose the Reserves, who stand our patriotic young men, such as compose the Reserves, who stand ready always to sacrifice their lives on the altar of their country.

DECLARATION OF PRINCIPLES

1. The object of the Reserve Officers' Association of the United States is to support and assist in the development and execution of a military policy for the United States which shall provide adequate national defense. The association believes this to be the surest and most economical insurance against future wars, to be essential to the prestige of our country, and necessary to further our world policies and interests.

2. The association believes this insurance against attack and

2. The association believes this insurance against attack and loss of prestige in international affairs can best be secured by:

(a) Maintaining a Navy adequate in all its parts to defend our shores and commerce, as outlined in the United States naval policy, thus providing a properly balanced Navy.

(b) Maintaining an adequate Regular Army, together with a National Guard and Organized Reserves as provided in the National Defense Act, which constitutes the framework on which a great national army of well-trained men can be quickly built to defend our country in time of war.

(c) Maintaining an appropriate air force equipped with aircraft of modern design, with sufficient periodic replacements to insure highly developed facilities for proper procurement in the event of

(d) Keeping abreast with the development of war material, so to insure a sufficient supply of ammunition and material for initial defensive operations; supporting the continual operation of plants necessary for the production of such material; and providing the machinery for the effective and economical mobilization of the industrial resources of the country.

(e) Providing for the annual training of all Reserve officers assigned or attached to combatant units, and such training of other Reserve officers as may be required, to the end that all Reserve officers may be at all times competently prepared to train unorganized militia, comprising the citizenry of the country, and to perform their duties as officers of the Army of the United States in the event of an emergency.

3. The association believes it to be the duty and obligation of its members as American citizens to urge Congress to make national defense a reality and to give effect to the National Defense Act and the United States naval policy by making appropriations adequate for all of the foregoing purposes; and their particular duty as members of this association to aid in the securing of appropriations needed for the training of Reserve officers, and to promote legislation in the interest of a more perfect organization of the Reserves. tion of the Reserves.

Among other important reasons for supporting the purposes enunciated by the Reserve Officers' Association is the effect of such policy upon the physical welfare of the young men of our country.

During the past 5 years it has been my privilege as a part of my official duties to have intimate contact with thousands of World War veterans, and I have been amazed to find how many of these men went into the service of their country laboring under minor physical handicaps. In most instances had these men been given the privilege of prior military training such defects would have been discovered and corrected.

During the past 2 or 3 years I have in the same manner come into intimate contact with thousands of our fellow citizens now dependent for their daily bread upon the relief program of the United States Government. Just as in the group of World War veterans, this group suffers from many physical disabilities which could have been corrected in earlier years had they been given the opportunity of physical examination which accompanies military training.

By supporting our modest plan of national defense, and especially by supporting the citizens' military training camps and the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, we offer the opportunity of physical training and medical examination to those of the young men of the Nation, thus insuring in the future a Nation better fit physically to deal with the problems of modern civilization.

To those listening to me tonight may I not say that America needs your active interest in a reasonable program of national defense? It needs your patriotic support of the young men who have volunteered their service in this plan; and I trust that you will join with them in creating the sentiment necessary to sustain will join with them in creating the sentiment necessary to sustain this reasonable and democratic policy.

HOLDING COMPANIES

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by including remarks I made over the radio last night on the holding company situation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following:

(Mr. RAYBURN is seated at the fireside with Cecil Dickson, of the Associated Press, and Sherman Mittell, of the National Home Associated Press, and Sherman Mittell, of the National Home Library Foundation.)

Mr. Mittell. Mr Rayburn, we are glad to have as guest at our fireside one who has played the important part you have in the history-making legislation of the last 4 years.

Mr. Dickson. All Texans know Sam Rayburn for his long service to his State and the Nation. He was the youngest speaker of the house the Texas Legislature ever had and has distinguished himself in Congress for more than 20 years.

Mr. Dickson. Mr. Rayburn, what do you consider should be the aims of men in public life at this critical period?

Mr. Rayburn. The fundamental purpose should be to ensure to every individual the greatest amount of freedom to work and earn a livelihood and to bring to every individual security in economic freedom. Physical and spiritual well being can rest only on economic well being. And economic well being for all of our citizens cannot be achieved unless we eliminate the inefficiency, waste, and cannot be achieved unless we eliminate the inemciency, waste, and greed from our business and economic life.

Mr. Dickson. In that connection, Mr. Rayburn, as Chairman of the House Interstate Commerce Committee, I understand you have introduced a bill to regulate and eventually eliminate utility holding companies because of what you term abuses and evils. Since you handled the Securities Act in 1933, and the Stock Market Control Act of 1934 will you give your rivers on the third measure.

you handled the Securities at in 1935, and the stock Market Control Act of 1934, will you give your views on the third measure designed to improve the economic welfare of our people?

Mr. RAYBURN. The President of the United States, in his message to Congress on January 4, said, among other things, that there should be brought about a restoration of sound conditions in the public-utilities field through abolition of the evil features of hold-

On February 6, 1935, I introduced H. R. 5423 which will, when enacted, have the effect of rapidly freeing our power and gas companies from the ownership and control of holding companies. Generally the holding company leads to secrecy, mismanagement, and in many instances, to downright fraud. We want American business to be free from a control which is secret.

business to be free from a control which is secret.

The holding company has developed to where control is exercised through a maze of intercorporate relationships, impossible to be understood by the ordinary man. The holding-company device has been pyramided to give a few small but powerful groups control of the billions of dollars of the public's money invested in the utility industry. This has placed the great utility properties of the country in the control of men who themselves have only a small stake in their real ownership and who have shown neither prudence nor capacity in the management of these properties.

Mr. Mittell. So, these are some of the evil features of holding companies to which the President referred? Tell us, Mr. Rayburn, what, exactly, is a holding company?

what, exactly, is a holding company?

what, exactly, is a holding company?

Mr. Rayburn. A corporation, as we know, is a company chartered by authority of a legislature. Such a corporation may go into the power business. What is the name of the company from which you get the electricity which is now burning in the lamps in your home? This company to which you pay for the electricity which comes through the meter into your house owns the electric-light plant and the transmission wires bringing the electric energy into your residence. The company itself issues stocks and bonds. It was through the sale of these stocks and bonds that the company got the money to build its power house and to lay its cables. But a holding company does not own a power plant. It is a company which holds—that is, buys—the stocks or bonds of power companies which do operate plants and lighting systems. Your electric-light company has an office in your home town. But very likely the company in your home town is itself owned by another company called a "holding company", which may be in Chicago or New York. A holding company with its office in New York may not own any property at all except the stock certificates issued by electric-light companies. The holding company buys these stock certificates not for an investment as a savings bank or an insurance company would buy them, but for the purpose of controlling the policies of the operating companies. That is, the manager of the holding company, because his company owns the voting stock of 100 electric-light companies, can appoint the manager of each electric-light company. The manager of the electric-light company in Your town is perhaps appointed to his position by the officers of some holding company in New York City.

Mr. Dickson. What does the holding company gain by this control of the operating companies?

Mr. Dickson. What does the holding company gain by this control of the operating companies?

Mr. Rayburn. The manager of the holding company becomes the big boss for all the electric-light companies which are controlled by the holding company. The controlling figure appoints the presidents and managers of each electric-light company and he tells them what to do. They cannot have any money for improvements without getting it through the master in the far-away city. When the manager of your local electric-light company needs a new dynamo in the power plant, or the money to extend cables in ments without getting it through the master in the far-away city. When the manager of your local electric-light company needs a new dynamo in the power plant, or the money to extend cables in a new addition to your town, he has to take the matter up with the supermanager in a holding company in another city.

This big boss tells him whether or not he can have the money to use in your town, how much can be used, what is to be bought with it, and more importantly, from whom he is to make the purchase, and how much he is to pay. Now if the top man is interested in a factory manufacturing the machinery your electric-light plant needs, he can make the manager of the company in your home town buy the machinery from the factory belonging to the big boss at the price he fixes. If the big boss in the faraway city charges the electric-light company in your home town more for the machinery than it is worth, nobody knows it. Then when your city council fixes the electric-light rates you shall pay, it has to fix them so that your company can pay the high price for the machinery which the chief of the holding company made it buy. If the holding company controls enough electric-light plants in enough towns and cities, it can, in various ways, make them pay millions of dollars into the holding company with the operating companies are secret, it is natural that loose and careless practices will develop, and sometimes frauds are perpetrated against whole communities. That is why I have introduced a bill into the House of Representatives. That is why Senator Wheeler, of Montana, has introduced a bill into the United States Senate. That is why in each House of your Congress there will soon be a discussion of these bills. It is in order that you naw know the price you pay for the electricity that lights your lamp, and the gas that cooks your food is a fair price; and that if you have saved $100 or $1,000, and bought a share of stock or a bond of your local light company, or of your gas company, that your investment will be protecte

Mr. Mittell. Mr. Rayburn, there must be an enormous investment in the utility business. How much are the electric-light plants in this country worth?

Mr. Rayburn. They and the gas plants have a value on the books of the companies of about $20,000,000,000. There are over 2,000 operating companies which own these properties in the different towns and cities, serving the countryside throughout our 48 States. Each operating company averages about $20,000,000 of property. Of course, there are some small ones with only $100,000 investment. Then there are great companies which serve cities such as Chicago and which have investments of many millions.

Two thousand companies are not so many to own $20,000.

such as Chicago and which have investments of many millions.

Two thousand companies are not so many to own $20,000,000,000 of property. A company with an average of $20,000,000 is itself a big company. But even those 2,000 companies are not independent. It may surprise you, but about 50 holding companies completely control these 2,000 operating companies. One holding company controls so many operating companies that the grand total value of the properties of all of the companies in that system amounts to $3,000,000,000. That is, just one holding company dominates one-seventh of all the property operated by electric-light companies

And then the banking houses control the holding companies which control the operating companies. One big banking house has an arrangement by which 8 or 10 of these big holding companies are tied together, so that more than one-fourth of the electric-light companies in the entire United States are subject to that banking influence.

Mr. Dickson. That seems to be a clever arrangement, this use

Mr. Blokson. That seems to be a clever arrangement, this use of the holding company. Will you tell us how it affects ordinary users of electricity?

Mr. RAYBURN. The holding-company device is so clever that a schoolgirl cannot use her curling iron, a housewife cannot clean her rug with a vacuum cleaner, or preserve her food in an electric her rug with a vacuum cleaner, or preserve her food in an electric refrigerator, a schoolboy cannot turn on a light to read his lesson, and a cook cannot light the gas in her stove without paying tribute to a holding company. The payment of this tribute is indirect. It is included in the rate paid for the lights and the gas. The amount is a secret. One hundred and forty-one million customers of power and light companies are subject to this secret assessment by the management of public-utility holding comYour President believes, I think, and your Congress believes, that all this secrecy must end. The charges for power and gas must be known to be fair and just. The investments in power and gas companies must be safe against the fraud, manipulation, mismanagement, or bad judgment of those sitting in the secret chambers of holding companies.

In 1933 I introduced and Congress passed the Securities Act, which regulates, and in many instances controls, the issuance of securities. From the Securities Commission the prospective investor can secure the facts about any security that he contemplates buying

In 1934 I introduced and the Congress passed the stock-exchange bill which controls trading in securities.

With these measures on the statute books and with the proposed bill to regulate holding companies passed, we will have completed a circle, so to speak, of Federal control which will be fair and just to those controlled, and bring about fair dealing by them with the

to those controlled, and bring about fair dealing by them with the public.

It has never been my purpose, nor has it been the purpose of Congress, to pass laws to punish any but the guilty, but it has rather been to bring about simple justice for all people. This is what I have in mind in dealing with holding companies. Investors in securities and the public, who are paying for the service of these utilities, have the right to feel and know, if possible, that they are getting these services at a fair and reasonable price.

Mr. Mittell. In this country we have always believed in individual freedom and initiative. Should not a corporation be permitted to buy anything it pleases?

Mr. Rayburn. This is a country in which the individual enjoys the maximum of freedom, and our business delevopment has been characterized by the initiative of the individual But by the individual we mean a living human being. There is a difference between a human being and a corporation when it comes to buying and selling and initiating some lawful activity. A corporation is a creature of the State. It is created by a charter, and the charter sets out what it can do and how long it can live. Certainly a corporation has no inalienable rights. It is for the people to say through their legislative bodies, first, whether there should be any corporations at all, and, second, just what a corporation may or may not do.

Mr. Dickson. Corporations have always owned stocks of other corporations, haven't they?

Mr. Rayburn. No. The corporation itself is a very recent development. It was not until about 1890 that States began to authorize corporations to own the stock of one another. My bill will eliminate that authority as far as public-utility holding companies are concerned. However, a provision has been inserted to permit an investment company like a savings bank or insurance company to purchase stocks and bonds in other corporations, but prohibits them from controlling the management of other corporations. But it is rare that investment compani

Mr. Dickson. The provision in your bill for the killing of the holding companies at the end of 5 years seems to have hit the utility industry as a pretty severe surprise.

Mr. Rayburn. I don't see why. If the holding companies have been listening to public opinion they must know that the public, and the Congress which represents the public, have long been making up their minds—not hurriedly but deliberately—that the abuses of the holding company and the terrific concentration of power it gave to a few bankers and promoters over the all-important power industry and the public can't go on. And if the publicutility holding company ultimately must be eliminated as a practical matter it seemed good sense to put in a deadline of 5 years, so that the industry and the public will both know that there will be a definite end of this holding-company business at some specific time, rather than have it drag on indefinitely and forever. This is very strongly the President's view, as I understand—and I'm very sure the holding-company leaders know it was his view. So I don't understand what they were surprised about.

Mr. Mittell. If you simply wanted to provide for the abolition of holding companies at the end of 5 years, why does the bill provide for regulation in the meantime?

Mr. Rayburn. In order to be practical and foresighted. Most of the regulation provided for in the bill is simply control of a process of rearrangement of properties and simplification of securities, under the supervision of the Securities and Exchange Commission. From all I hear even the holding companies are willing to trust that commission implicitly. I've just pointed out how many of the electric light and power companies in individual localities a few big holding companies control. It's a big job to persuade or make them break up. If we insisted the break-up begin tomorrow and be finished within a year, there would be great complaining that the job couldn't be physically and legally carried out in that time. And there would be a lot in the compla business will not be difficult either for the Government or for their investors investors.

The rest of the regulatory provisions are to protect the electric light and power companies in everybody's home town from being milked by holding companies during the 5-year break-up period. That really means protecting both the consumer who buys light and power from those local companies, and the people who finance those local companies with their savings. We have to give the public that protection immediately, no matter what we ultimately do with the holding companies.

Mr. DUKKSON, I understand that on Friday officers of leading do with the holding companies.

Mr. Dickson. I understand that on Friday, officers of leading public-utility holding companies sent letters to all their security holders, asking them to write their Congressmen to oppose the bill, because it would destroy the value of their securities. Now, Mr. Rayburn, what is going to happen to the thousands of investors, widows, orphans, educational and charitable institutions who own securities of holding companies during all this process of whittling down and transforming and abolishing holding companies prodown, and transforming, and abolishing holding companies pro-vided for in this bill?

Mr. RAYBURN. I think the report of the Federal Power Commission has shown that the sentimental propaganda that holding-company securities are held largely by widows and orphans just isn't true

But passing by all that, I'm especially glad you asked that question. I am deeply interested in the investor, particularly the small investor who tries to conserve his or her savings for old age, sickness, and the education of children. I am still old-fashioned enough to believe in thrift and the rewards of thrift. I am really worried by the growth of the feeling, particularly among the youth of the country, that it does not pay to save; that it is impossible to provide for tomorrow, anyhow, so we might as well spend what we have got and let the devil take the hind-most. I want to see it possible for people who work to be able to put aside enough for a rainy day. I want the great mass of the people of this country to feel that they have some savings to preserve, and consequently have a genuine stake in the stability of serve, and consequently have a genuine stake in the stability of our Government and our economic system.

The truth is that wherever securities of holding companies now represent actual value, those values will not be hurt by this bill, and the investors whose money has financed the public-utility industry will profit by the bill as investors, just as certainly as they will profit by it as consumers. The proposed legislation, let me say emphatically, does not destroy or confiscate any property right or investment. It will require that companies simplify the number and kind of securities they have sold to the public. It may, for instance, require a company with a dozen kinds of stocks and bonds to boil them down to one or two. It will require that operating companies and the stockholders of operating companies be freed from the many devices by which holding companies control the properties these stockholders really own. It will require companies to rearrange their properties so that they are compact and not scattered all over the United States. But nothing of value is taken from any investor, and when the simplification process is completed the investor will really know, as he does not know today, what he owns.

Mr. MITTELL. Do you mean to state that elimination of the hold-The truth is that wherever securities of holding companies now

Mr. Mittell. Do you mean to state that elimination of the holding company would not be a great hardship on the owners of the stocks of these companies?

Mr. Rayburn. I believe any bill which the Congress will pass will provide for equitable arrangements fair to all security owners, even where the company relationships are most mixed, intertwined, and confused. I want to call your attention to the fact that the owners of these stocks of holding companies have not been any too well cared for under our present lack of Federal legislation. For example, the low price for the common stock of American Power & Light Co. in December 1929 was 68%, in December 1934 it was 3. Low price for the common stock of Columbia Gas & Electric Corporation in December 1929 was 62½, in December 1934 it was 6%. Low price for the common stock of Commonwealth & Southern in December 1929 was 11¾ and in December 1934 it was 1. Low price for the common stock of Stone & Webster, Inc.. in December 1929 was 72½ and in December 1934 it was 3%. From these quotations from the market, you can see that the stocks of power and gasholding companies, as a class, have ceased to be very attractive even to speculators. As you recognize, I have given quotations from some of the holding companies which are among the best managed. Insull has long ago crashed altogether; and I understand there is a proceeding on now to force Associated Gas & Electric Co. through bankruptoy.

a proceeding on now to force Associated Gas & Electric Co. through bankruptcy.

Let's just look at the position of holding-company securities today, frankly and realistically. On the average they are selling at a very small fraction of the prices at which the public originally bought them—their drop is far greater in proportion than the drop in almost any other class of security. Why? Because on the whole they simply were not good securities. The millions of dollars made through the holding companies did not go to the investor. They went to the banker, the stock promoter, and the corporate insider. Thousands of investors throughout the country, when they bought holding-company securities thought they were putting their money into the industry that brings to you your gas and electricity. But in so many cases their money never went into the industry at all. Their money went to buy, at fantastic prices, from corporate insiders, utility properties that had already been built. The reports of the Federal Trade Commission show how that happened over and over again. The millions lost by how that happened over and over again. The millions lost by investors in holding-company securities has not been due to the Government, nor will it be due to the bill that I have introduced. It will be due solely to the greed for money and power, to the incompetence and recklessness of those who created and manipulated these holding devices

Mr. Dickson. Do you think if holding companies were allowed to continue, investors would eventually receive their money at the rate of a hundred cents on the dollar?

Mr. Rayburn. No. There have been too many casualties in the holding-company field. In most cases the investments in holding companies could not come back to anywhere near the ridiculous prices that investors paid for them, even if the Government left the holding companies forever free to continue their financial manipulations. The Government didn't have to do anything to make Insull crash. Under the most favorable conditions the manipulations. The Government didn't have to do anything to make Insull crash. Under the most favorable conditions the holding companies have simply got to go through a period of reorganization. The real question is whether we are going to allow these reorganizations to be carried on by the same people who brought us into this mess, or whether we are going to protect the investor, and see to it that what he has left in the enterprises to be reorganized are not taken from him.

MITTELL. Just what are the assets of holding companies on which they issued securities?

which they issued securities?

which they issued securities?

Mr. RAYBURN. A public-utility holding company usually has only two kinds of assets. One kind is a series of contracts with the local electric light and power companies it controls. These contracts, to put it bluntly, are usually intended to permit the holding companies to milk local companies by collecting fees from them for management, construction, financial, and all other kinds of services, in which all independent competition has been carefully eliminated. Everyone has known ever since the revelations of the Federal Trade Commission that these contracts have not to go. The better companies have already taken steps to get got to go. The better companies have already taken steps to get rid of them, and the prices of holding-company securities have already discounted, as the saying goes, the certainty that sooner or later legislation would make all holding companies drop these contracts

The other kind of assets owned by holding companies are the stocks and bonds and other securities they own in the local electric light and power companies. The bill I have introduced does not hurt these local properties at all. As a matter of fact, its chief purpose is to help those local companies by freeing them from the contracts and secret arrangements by which the holding companies have milked them. Management of the operating companies will be turned back to local people who live in the com-munity, and who know how to manage the local company so as to get fair returns for the holders of its securities, without milking the community to the point where it revolts and demands a municipal plant. The only effect this bill will have upon those local properties, is to compel the holding company to dissolve, so that the holders of its securities will receive securities of local that the holders of its securities will receive securities of local operating companies or their cash value. And when he actually operating companies or their cash value. And when he actually holds these securities of operating companies the investor will receive all the legitimate dividends that these operating companies can pay. These dividends have in the past too frequently never reached the investor. They have been used to pay holding-company officials and bankers high salaries, bonuses, and fees, or used to purchase further securities at exorbitant prices from corporate insiders. In many cases the only dividend the holding company paid was a stock dividend which turned out to be a worthless piece of paper!

Mr. DICKSON. Do you believe that growing demands for munic-

Mr. Dickson. Do you believe that growing demands for municipal power plants result from holding companies and the rates their operating companies charge?

Mr. Rayburn. I do. Only yesterday a legislative committee investigating the conditions in the utility industry in the conservative State of New York, reported that rates in the State were "grossly excessive." I'd like to quote a little from the report: "The present rates probably arise from the idea that public utilities are operated by the executives for the sole benefit of the stockholders and without consideration for the consuming public. "A persistence in this belief can only result in loss and grief for the stockholder unless marked reductions can be had in rates for electrical energy." for electrical energy.

"The consuming and long-suffering public can only be protected by municipal operation or the rates controlled by a municipal

"We believe the progressive elements in the operating companies are carefully considering our suggested plans for progressive reduc-tion in rates with the likelihood of their adoption.

"Stockholders must now realize that only by fair and reasonable rates can their investment be safeguarded and a fair return guar-

I believe the statement that the future existence of private operating companies depends upon lower rates, is absolutely true.

Mr. Mittell. Will the very process of reorganization of holding companies, their rearrangement into operating companies, and the distribution of securities of operating companies to investors, eat up the investor's interest in reorganization fees and expenses?

Mr. Rayburn. Of course, in the usual process of reorganization and regrouping of properties the investor would be given the same and regrouping of properties the investor would be given the same milking by reorganizing bankers and their lawyers that he has had to take in reilroads, real estate, and every other kind of corporate reorganization. But to meet that danger this bill puts the entire process of reorganization, including fees and so-called "reorganization plans" under the control of the Securities and Exchange Commission. I know there will be a great deal of complaining about this on the part of those who hope to trim the investor on the break-up of the holding companies as they trimmed him in the process of putting them together. These are the sections of the bill on which I am going to watch amendments most closely. But as the bill is now drawn, I feel sure there isn't any closely. But as the bill is now drawn, I feel sure there isn't any place where scalpers can get their knives into the oyster. And if no amendments weaken the protection the bill tries to give the investor in this regard, there is no reason why there should be any shrinkage in the actual value of the investor's interest in the operating companies which underlie the holding companies, and the investor ought to come out of the process with far better securities than those with which he went into it.

Mr. Dickson. Has opposition developed to the point where strong efforts will be made to defeat the measure?

Mr. RAYBURN. As usual where the Federal Government sets out to regulate something, there is much propagands. I know all sorts of attempts will be made to frighten the people. Already sorts of attempts will be made to frighten the people. Already telegrams and letters have been sent by holding-company people. You've already told me about that batch of letters sent out on Friday. I suppose most of them will be delivered on Monday morning. I know the people will be told that the securities and properties will be dumped on the market; that the banks will call loans and that the public-utility business will be demoralized. A picture of disaster will be painted in the same false colors that the get-rich-quick people painted when they sold the public securities at outrageous prices. But just remember that when we passed the Stock Market Control Act last year, some leading brokers claimed that it would close the stock markets, and instead they are operating better under Federal regulation than before.

And it is going to be hard for us here who are really trying to protect your interests in Washington to get your ear, to answer

And it is going to be hard for us here who are really trying to protect your interests in Washington to get your ear, to answer all the arguments that will be made to you. The flood of propaganda this year will undoubtedly be just like the flood of propaganda which was used to frighten investors last year about the stock-exchange bill. We have no way of sending you a letter and a telegram every day to answer those you probably will get. We have no money for advertisements in newspapers. We have no way of carrying on a whispering campaign.

In all the charges and countercharges that will be made on the

In all the charges and countercharges that will be made on the fight on this bill you will have to trust someone. The bill combines the best knowledge available in your Government after years of investigation by the Federal Trade Commission, the Federal Power Commission, special investigatory committees of Congress, the National Power Policy Committee, which represents all Government Departments concerned, and many State commissions. If you have to trust someone, why don't you trust your Government in this business rather than the people who sold you securities at 100 that are now selling about 10. Instead of taking the suggestion of the officers of your holding company to write your Congressman to stop this bill, which after careful investigation the Government has devised for your protection, why don't you write back to those officers and suggest that after mismanaging your investment as they have for the last 10 years, they save what little is left of it by not paying big fees to publicity agents and a lot of lawyers to make the process of protecting you as expensive a job as possible for your Government and for you?

Mr. Mittell. Is this bill constitutional?

Mr. Rayburn. I am sure it is. This bill has been reviewed by a committee headed by the Attorney General of the United States. The managers of your holding company will, of course, pay exorbitant fees to big New York lawyers to come down here to delay this bill by telling Congress, as they always try to tell Congress, that it can't legally do anything which will affect the Interests of the clients who are paying them these exhorbitant fees. But this bill has been worked out by men whom we consider just as good constitutional lawyers as those big New Yorkers. And I'd like to remind the people who want to talk about the constitutionality of the regulation; second, there is absolutely no constitutional doubt that if the nolding companies are not satisfied with the carefully worked out provisions of this bill, to make the process of elimination as gentle as In all the charges and countercharges that will be made on the fight on this bill you will have to trust someone. The bill com-

Mr. Dickson. Mr. Rayburn, you used to have the reputation of being the most conservative man in the House. How do you reconcile your advocacy of the holding-company legislation and of the Securities Acts with your supposedly deep-grained conserva-

Mr. Rayburn. In my opinion these bills I have sponsored are truly conservative. We wouldn't need legislation of this character if we were going to change our system of private property. But we do need it to preserve that system. This holding legislation, like the securities legislation, is chiefly aimed to obtain fair play for property interests, whether that interest is the interest of millions of investors throughout the country or millions of consumers. It is becoming increasingly evident that the system of individual enterprise and private property has got to be made to work fairly, if it is to be preserved from the attacks of predatory rich men on the one hand and selfish demagogues on the other. When I first entered public life over 20 years ago I found that Government tended to steer a middle course, merely by refusing to yield to pressure from the right and from the left, or by merely Government tended to steer a middle course, including the yield to pressure from the right and from the left, or by merely allowing the extreme forces to counteract each other. Today, howallowing the extreme forces to counteract each other. Today, how-ever, I find it much more difficult for the Government to steer a middle course, because the extremists to the right and the extremists to the left are coming more and more to have a similar philosophy of government. Both of them want to run everybody. I find little difference between the state Socialists on the one hand, who would subject us to the tyrannies of a superstate, and those whom my friend, Ray Moley, so aptly called "private Socialists"—the greedy, power-mad managers of other people's property—who would subject us to the tyrannies of supermanagement and superindustry. Twenty years ago the conservative middle-of-the-roaders could afford to remain calm and be content to resist impulsive action. Today the true conservative must fight and fight vigorously to maintain the principle of fair play for individual enterprise against competing tyrannies.

Mr. Mittell. Thank you, Congressman Rayburn.

THE BONUS SITUATION

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by inserting a radio speech I intend to make this evening.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a radio address delivered by myself February 21, 1935, in which I discussed the payment of the adjusted-service certificates.

The address is as follows:

I hope to convince you that the adjusted-service certificates, which are held by three and a half million veterans of the average value of $1,000 each, should be paid in cash now in a way that no new debt will be created and without the issuance of more bonds or the levying of more taxes.

World War veterans hold these certificates, and less than 500,000 of them have not borrowed 50 percent of each certificate, the limit allowed by law.

On these loans at first they were required to pay 6-, 7-, and 8-percent interest compounded annually. The interest rate has been reduced. Yet, under the present arrangement, if the contract is not changed by 1945, when the certificates are made payable, compound interest that they are paying on what they have borrowed will practically consume the remaining half of their certificates.

BANKS AND GOVERNMENT CONSUME ONE-HALI

Loans were made to them by the Government and the banks. I do not believe that the Government should now permit the remaining half of these certificates to be consumed in interest charges on a loan of the first half, and I do not believe it is right for the veterans to be required to pay the banks and the Government $2 of their certificates in order to get $1 in cash.

ARE THEY DUE BEFORE 1945?

The question is often asked, "How can you justify asking for the payment of a debt that is not due until 1945?" The answer is, Although the certificates are made payable January 1, 1945, there was a mistake made in the enactment of this law, caused by star chamber proceedings and "gag rule" tactics, which caused the veterans to lose 7 years' interest on the money that Congress confessed was due them as of the time they rendered the service. In my presence the then Secretary of the Treasury admitted—I do not believe that the word "confessed" would be too strong—that interest for 7 years was completely ignored in arriving at the that interest for 7 years was completely ignored in arriving at the amount due the veterans.

If we will now correct this mistake and adjust the interest for the veterans so as to give them the same consideration, and no more, that all others received on contracts growing out of the more, that all others received on contracts growing out of the World War, each veteran was entitled to an amount equal to the full face value of his certificate on October 1, 1931.

If the contract is revised to do equity and carry out the intent of Congress, a veteran who has borrowed 50 percent has not been paid what Congress intended him to have, but he has received what amounts to the accumulated interest on what Congress confessed was due. The principal of the debt remains intact.

During the past 6 years we have sold the country and Congress on the proposition that these contracts should be revised. In asking for the revision we have also shown the country how the debt can be paid if the contracts are revised, as we believe they should be, without costing the Government one penny and by actually saving the Government over a billion and a half dollars.

DOUBLE CROSSERS

If we were to come in now and ask that our plan be changed in a way that will cost this Nation $4,000,000,000, I imagine we would have to face the charge of being double crossers.

The plan of payment has been an essential part of the question of paying the adjusted-service certificates. Sixty percent at least of our support is contingent upon the plan of paying the certificates without new nontaxable bonds or new taxes. Therefore any effort to change this plan is in the direction of defeating the proposal entirely.

posal entirely.

We made a definite promise to the people of this Nation that the debt could be paid without cost to them and that such payment would promote the general welfare.

The term "bonus" is a misnomer. It was coined by the enemies of the law and should never be used. If it is a bonus we have no right to ask for payment at this time. If it is a debt for services rendered, as it is, we have a right to ask that it be paid in the same way and manner that the Government pays all of its other debts.

H. R. 1 CARRIES OUT PROMISES

The bill H. R. 1, the Patman bill, provides for the payment of these certificates in the way that we have told the country the past 6 years that they should be paid. This bill carries out the mandates of the major veterans' organizations, including the American Legion resolution at Miami, which said that the payment will not create a new debt.

It is the same principle that passed the House of Representatives June 15, 1932, by a vote of 211 for and 176 against, and again March 12, 1934, by a vote of 295 for to 125 against.

MONKEY WRENCH

It is the bill that the House of Representatives would have passed a month ago had it not been for the action of Mr. Frank N. Belgrano, Jr., National Commander of the American Legion, who caused to be thrown into the legislative machinery a monkey wrench in the form of another bill that will not carry out our promises to the people and is contrary to the American Legion resolution resolution.

BANKERS' BONUS BILL

Commander Belgrano says that our bill cannot pass the Senate. Therefore, he wants a bill that will require $2,000,000,000 in taxes to be raised to pay the veterans and $2,000,000,000 in taxes to be raised to pay the large bankers' interest on the $2,000,000,000 that the veterans received. His bill is a bankers' bonus bill. It is true that such a proposal will give the large bankers their customary rake-off, but it will be violating the promises we have made to the people on this issue.

UNITED STATES SENATE DEFENDED

I expect to defend the United States Senate against the charge that Commander Belgrano made that the Senaters will not vote for our bill, H. R. 1, on account of the method of payment.

July 11, 1932, the question before the United States Senate was, "Shall national banks be allowed to deposit Government obligations payable in 1945 or in the future and receive new money in return for them and at the same time continue to receive interest on the bonds deposited to secure the money?" The proposal was adopted by a vote of 53 to 18.

Again on March 9, 1933, 73 Senators voted for end 7 contests

Again, on March 9, 1933, 73 Senators voted for and 7 against Again, on March 9, 1933, 73 Senators voted for and 7 against a bill which permitted Federal Reserve banks to deposit Government obligations payable in 1945 or in the future and receive "new money" in return for them. Under this law the money cost these banks about 27 cents a thousand dollars, the cost of printing.

SAME LAW FOR ONE WHO PLOWS FURROW AS ONE WHO OWNS FIELD

Again, on February 27, 1934, there was passed in the United States Senate a bill embodying this same principle. There was no record vote, but no Senator raised his voice in opposition to it. Therefore, when Mr. Belgrano charges that the Senate will not pass our bill, he, in effect, says that the Members of the United States Senate are not willing to give the veterans the same rights and privileges with Government obligations that they have voted to give the banks of this country. In other words, he says that the Senators will contend for one law for banks and another law for veterans; that they are not willing to have the same law apply to the man who plows the furrow as the man who owns the field.

I do not believe that Commander Belgrano's charges are well founded. I think they were made without a knowledge of the facts, and since I have shown him that the Senate has heretofore endorsed the same principles as embodied in H. R. 1, he should withdraw his opposition to the bill and support it.

Since I will not have the time to include everything that I would like to discuss, a copy of this speech and all information relating to this question will be sent to anyone requesting it of Representative WRIGHT PATMAN, Washington, D. C.

WHAT SIN ARE WE TRYING TO COMMIT?

Now, let us see what H. R. 1 provides. What sin are we trying to commit in our efforts to get the veterans paid in "new money"?

The veterans hold Government obligations. They rendered services for these obligations. The banks hold Government obligations which they paid money or credit for. An obligation purchased with services is just as valuable as one purchased with money.

The banks are privileged to deposit 1945 Government obligations and receive "new money" in return for them. In addition to the use of the money they receive interest on the obligations each year until 1945.

We are asking that the veterans be allowed to deposit 1945 obligations and receive "new money" in return for them. The veterans will not be allowed to draw interest between now and 1945, as allowed the banks.

The Bank of America, formerly the Bank of Italy, of which the commander of the American Legion is vice president, deposited $45,000,000 in bonds and received $45,000,000 in money in return. The commander evidently believes it is right for his bank to receive money in this way or he would not be a party to it. I have asked him to tell me why he opposes the veterans doing identically the same thing in the same way. He has refused to answer.

The commander's bank receives interest on the bonds while it uses the money. The interest on the bonds, if the average rate is paid, will amount to over a million and a quarter dollars a year, which the Government is paying the commander's bank each year to put $45,000,000 in circulation. The veterans offer to put that much money in circulation without any million and a quarter dollars a year bonus, or any other bonus.

It will help the country more to pay the veterans $2,000,000,000 than it will to give the banks of the Nation $60,000,000 or $80,-000,000 a year bonus to put $2,000,000,000 in circulation.

In 1932 the large banks, same as the small ones, were in need of Government aid. They owed money that they could not pay.

of Government aid. They owed money that they could not pay. They were in need of Government help.

The commander's bank was aided by the Government, which not only helped his bank but helped the people of California. The 64½ million dollars which it received in the early part of 1932 substantially helped, if it did not save, the institution. It is true that this was a loan from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and the bank's averaged that the bank's averaged that the falls. and the bank's prosperity since that time has enabled it to fully repay the loan.

I mention this not for the purpose of criticizing the banks or the commander but for the purpose of impressing upon the commander the fact that the veterans of the country are in the same condition as his bank was in 1932. They owe for loans on their certificates which they cannot repay. The compound interest on the first half is eating up the other half. They desire the Government to pay the remainder due now on the showing that it is really past due, although payable in 1945, and that it will help everybody. They can take the money and buy comforts and necessities of life which are very much needed by many of them. They can pay debts that they are now forced to pay from 10 to 40 percent interest on. They can purchase or pay for a home or a farm. I mention this not for the purpose of criticizing the banks or

The substantial sum will help them greatly at a time in life when their children are young, when the money is needed the most.

VETERANS ASKING FOR SAME RIGHTS AS COMMANDER'S BANK

Since the Government helped the commander's bank under the Since the Government helped the commander's bank under the same circumstances and since the Government is allowing the commander's bank to obtain money in the same way that we want the veterans to obtain money, and, further, in view of the fact that the House is overwhelmingly in favor of our bill and the Senate has heretofore unanimously endorsed the same principle of payment as embodied in our bill, the commander should take these points into consideration, admit that he is wrong, and work shoulder to shoulder with us in this fight and help us get this debt paid. Cooperation and not division is needed to further our cause cause.

The fact must not be overlooked that the country is very much in need of an additional circulating medium.

MORE ACTUAL MONEY NEEDED

My good friend, J. S. Cullinan, of Houston, Tex., has just pointed out to me that we have less actual money per capita in circulation than we have had since 1917. In fact, the demand deposits subject to check and money outstanding in the form of "greenbacks" and coins represent our medium of exchange.

These demand deposits aggregated $21,000,000,000 when times were good—from 1926 to 1929—but have decreased to $14,000,000,000 at the end of 1934. Therefore, the banks have destroyed $7,000,000,000 of our circulating medium.

Are we committing an economic crime in trying to restore $2,000,000,000 of this circulating medium, that the banks have destroyed $7,000,000,000 of through their deflationary policies?

The per capita circulation of money and credit in 1916 was $141. From 1926 to 1930 it averaged $200 per capita. It is now down to $150 per capita. Therefore, one-quarter of our medium of exchange has been absolutely destroyed. You can no more do business with an insufficient amount of money than you can handle the commerce of this country with insufficient transportahandle the commerce of this country with insufficient transportation facilities.

If we pay the veterans $2,000,000,000, no one will be paying interest on this money while it is outstanding.

SAFETY CLAUSES

If there is too much money in circulation the Secretary of the Treasury will be privileged to cause Federal Reserve banks and national banks to return some of their money and receive their deposited bonds. The money will be canceled and put out of circulation if there is danger of inflation.

There is no danger on earth of uncontrolled expansion or unbridled inflation of the currency under the terms of our bill. No informed person will deny this statement.

STORM CELLAR FOR CONGRESSMEN

The Belgrano bill, H. R. 3896, which my friend FRED VINSON, of Kentucky, introduced at the request of the commander, does not provide for a method of payment. It represents a storm cellar with all modern convenience for any Representative or Senator who desires to vote with the veterans and at the same time give them nothing. Of course, I do not say that any Member of Congress has such a thing in mind.

The Belgrano bill merely authorizes an appropriation to be made which would be all right if the amount involved were a small sum and under ordinary facts and circumstances, but in this case $2,000,000,000 is involved, and we do not want the bill in such a condition that we will have to make two successful fights in order to attain our goal.

If the Belgrano bill should pass and become a law, a bill would then have to be introduced, providing for the method of payment and, of course, Congress would be reluctant to issue $2,000,000,000 in bonds right now. It would cost the Government $4,000,000,000 by the time they were paid, and there is a likelihood that no agreement could be reached on the method of payment, and the veterans would have a law but no money. They would be right where they started.

Those of us who have studied this question for years believe that the best strategy is to have the method of payment attached to the bill as we have it in H. R. 1.

Today we filed a petition to force early consideration of H. R. 1 which will permit any bill to be considered. Commander Belgrano's actions and words are causing many members to fail to sign this petition who are favorable to the proposal.

BELGRANO CHALLENGED TO DEBATE

It has come to my attention that Mr. Frank N. Belgrano, national commander of the American Legion, who will speak over the Columbia Broadcasting System's network from 11:45 to 12 o'clock on the night of February 27, will make an appeal to the rank and file of the American Legion to support the bill H. R. 3896, by Representative Fird Vinson, of Kentucky.

I was a member of the committee at the American Legion convention held at Miami, Fla., which adopted a resolution by a vote of 987 to 183, on October 25, 1934, recommending the immediate cash payment of the adjusted-service certificates without creating any additional debt, and I charge that Mr. Belgrano has violated the mandate of that convention by endorsing the Vinson bond-issue bill.

bond-issue bill.

The House must soon decide which of these measures, which so vitally affect the welfare of the former service men, is to be passed. In order that the rank and file of the American Legion may be informed fully on the provisions of these two bills before they decide which to support, I most respectfully here and now challenge Mr. Belgrano to debate this question with me. I will undertake to show that H. R. I carries out the mandate of the American Legion convention, while Mr. Belgrano endeavors to justify his repudiation of that mandate.

can Legion convention, while Mr. Belgrano endeavors to justify his repudiation of that mandate.

No doubt it can be arranged for me to speak over the Columbia Broadcasting System on the night of February 27. I am willing that Mr. Belgrano arrange the time to suit himself, providing that the one opening the debate shall have time for a rejoinder. I trust that Mr. Belgrano will avail himself of this opportunity to have both sides of this issue presented to the members of the American Legion in particular and the radio audience in general.

MY BROADCAST ALSO FEBRUARY 27

On the night of February 27, 1935, from 11:30 to 11:45 eastern standard time I will make a speech on this same subject over the National Broadcasting Co,'s network. I will attempt to convince the radio audience that H. R. 1 and not H. R. 3896 should be enacted into law.

If you desire a copy of this speech and full information on this subject, request it of Representative WRIGHT PATMAN, Washington, D. C.

READING OF WASHINGTON'S FAREWELL ADDRESS

The VICE PRESIDENT. Under an order of the Senate, the Senator from Vermont [Mr. Austin] will read the Farewell Address of President Washington.

Mr. AUSTIN read the address, as follows:

To the people of the United States.

FRIENDS AND FELLOW CITIZENS: The period for a new election of a citizen to administer the executive government of the United States being not far distant, and the time actually arrived when your thoughts must be employed in designating the person who is to be clothed with that important trust, it appears to me proper, especially as it may conduce to a more distinct expression of the public voice, that I should now apprise you of the resolution I have formed, to decline being considered among the number of those, out of whom a choice is to be made.

I beg you, at the same time, to do me the justice to be assured, that this resolution has not been taken, without a strict regard to all the considerations appertaining to the relation which binds a dutiful citizen to his country; and that, in withdrawing the tender of service which silence in my situation might imply, I am influenced by no diminution of zeal for your future interest; no deficiency of grateful respect for your past kindness; but am supported by a full conviction that the step is compatible with both.

The acceptance of, and continuance hitherto in the office to which your suffrages have twice called me, have been a uniform sacrifice of inclination to the opinion of duty, and to a deference for what appeared to be your desire. I constantly hoped that it would have been much earlier in my power, consistently with motives which I was not at liberty to disregard, to return to that retirement from which I had been reluctantly drawn. The strength of my inclination to do this, previous to the last election, had even led to the preparation of an address to declare it to you; but mature reflection on the then perplexed and critical posture of our affairs with foreign nations, and the unanimous advice of persons entitled to my confidence, impelled me to abandon the idea.

I rejoice that the state of your concerns external as well as internal, no longer renders the pursuit of inclination incompatible with the sentiment of duty or propriety; and am persuaded, whatever partiality may be retained for my services, that in the present circumstances of our country, you will not disapprove my determination to retire.

The impressions with which I first undertook the arduous trust, were explained on the proper occasion. In the discharge of this trust, I will only say that I have, with good intentions, contributed towards the organization and administration of the government, the best exertions of which a very fallible judgment was capable. Not unconscious in the outset, of the inferiority of my qualifications, experience, in my own eyes, perhaps still more in the eyes of others, has strengthened the motives to diffidence of myself; and, every day, the increasing weight of years admonishes me more and more, that the shade of retirement is as necessary to me as it will be welcome. Satisfied that if any circumstances have given peculiar value to my services they were temporary, I have the consolation to believe that, while choice and prudence invite me to quit the political scene, patriotism does not forbid it.

In looking forward to the moment which is to terminate the career of my political life, my feelings do not permit me to suspend the deep acknowledgment of that debt of gratitude which I owe to my beloved country, for the many honors it has conferred upon me; still more for the steadfast confidence with which it has supported me; and for the opportunities I have then enjoyed of manifesting my inviolable attachment, by services faithful and persevering, though in usefulness unequal to my zeal. If benefits have resulted to our country from these services, let it always be remembered to your praise, and as an instructive example in our annals, that under circumstances in which the passions, agitated in every direction, were liable to mislead amidst appearances sometimes dubious, vicissitudes of fortune often discouraging-in situations in which not unfrequently, want of success has countenanced the spirit of criticism,—the constancy of your support was the essential prop of the efforts, and a guarantee | maritime and commercial enterprise, and precious materials of the plans, by which they were effected. Profoundly penetrated with this idea, I shall carry it with me to my grave, as a strong incitement to unceasing vows that heaven may continue to you the choicest tokens of its beneficence—that your union and brotherly affection may be perpetual—that the free constitution, which is the work of your hands, may be sacredly maintained—that its administration in every department may be stamped with wisdom and virtue-that, in fine, the happiness of the people of these states, under the auspices of liberty, may be made complete by so careful a preservation, and so prudent a use of this blessing, as will acquire to them the glory of recommending it to the applause, the affection and adoption of every nation which is yet a

Here, perhaps, I ought to stop. But a solicitude for your welfare, which cannot end, but with my life, and the apprehension of danger, natural to that solicitude, urge me, on an occasion like the present, to offer to your solemn contemplation, and to recommend to your frequent review, some sentiments which are the result of much reflection, of no inconsiderable observation, and which appear to me all important to the permanency of your felicity as a people. These will be offered to you with the more freedom, as you can only see in them the disinterested warnings of a parting friend, who can possibly have no personal motive to bias his counsel. Nor can I forget, as an encouragement to it, your indulgent reception of my sentiments on a former and not dissimilar

Interwoven as is the love of liberty with every ligament of your hearts, no recommendation of mine is necessary to fortify or confirm the attachment.

The unity of government which constitutes you one people, is also now dear to you. It is justly so; for it is a main pillar in the edifice of your real independence; the support of your tranquility at home: your peace abroad; of your safety; of your prosperity; of that very liberty which you so highly prize. But, as it is easy to foresee that, from different causes and from different quarters much pains will be taken, many artifices employed, to weaken in your minds the conviction of this truth; as this is the point in your political fortress against which the batteries of internal and external enemies will be most constantly and actively (though often covertly and insidiously) directed; it is of infinite moment, that you should properly estimate the immense value of your national union to your collective and individual happiness; that you should cherish a cordial, habitual, and immovable attachment to it; accustoming yourselves to think and speak of it as of the palladium of your political safety and prosperity; watching for its preservation with jealous anxiety; discountenancing whatever may suggest even a suspicion that it can, in any event, be abandoned; and indignantly frowning upon the first dawning of every attempt to alienate any portion of our country from the rest, or to enfeeble the sacred ties which now link together the various parts.

For this you have every inducement of sympathy and interest. Citizens by birth, or choice, of a common country, that country has a right to concentrate your affections. The name of American, which belongs to you in your national capacity, must always exalt the just pride of patriotism, more than any appellation derived from local discriminations. With slight shades of difference, you have the same religion, manners, habits, and political principles. You have, in a common cause, fought and triumphed together; the independence and liberty you possess are the work of joint counsels, and joint efforts, of common dangers, sufferings and successes.

But these considerations, however powerfully they address themselves to your sensibility, are greatly outweighed by those which apply more immediately to your interest.—Here, every portion of our country finds the most commanding motives for carefully guarding and preserving the union of the whole.

The north, in an unrestrained intercourse with the south, protected by the equal laws of a common government, finds in the productions of the latter, great additional resources of of manufacturing industry.-The south, in the same intercourse, benefiting by the same agency of the north, sees its agriculture grow and its commerce expand. Turning partly into its own channels the seamen of the north, it finds its particular navigation invigorated; and while it contributes, in different ways, to nourish and increase the general mass of the national navigation, it looks forward to the protection of a maritime strength, to which itself is unequally adapted. The east, in a like intercourse with the west, already finds, and in the progressive improvement of interior communications by land and water, will more and more find a valuable vent for the commodities which it brings from abroad, or manufactures at home. The west derives from the east supplies requisite to its growth and comfort—and what is perhaps of still greater consequence, it must of necessity owe the secure enjoyment of indispensable outlets for its own productions, to the weight, influence, and the future maritime strength of the Atlantic side of the Union, directed by an indissoluble community of interest as one nation. Any other tenure by which the west can hold this essential advantage. whether derived from its own separate strength; or from an apostate and unnatural connection with any foreign power, must be intrinsically precarious.

While then every part of our country thus feels an immediate and particular interest in union, all the parts combined cannot fail to find in the united mass of means and efforts, greater strength, greater resource, proportionably greater security from external danger, a less frequent interruption of their peace by foreign nations; and, what is of inestimable value, they must derive from union, an exemption from those broils and wars between themselves, which so frequently afflict neighboring countries not tied together by the same government; which their own rivalship alone would be sufficient to produce, but which opposite foreign alliances, attachments, and intrigues, would stimulate and embitter.-Hence likewise, they will avoid the necessity of those overgrown military establishments, which under any form of government are inauspicious to liberty, and which are to be regarded as particularly hostile to republican liberty. In this sense it is, that your union ought to be considered as a main prop of your liberty, and that the love of the one ought to endear to you the preservation of the other.

These considerations speak a persuasive language to every reflecting and virtuous mind, and exhibit the continuance of the union as a primary object of patriotic desire. Is there a doubt whether a common government can embrace so large a sphere? let experience solve it. To listen to mere speculation in such a case were criminal. We are authorized to hope that a proper organization of the whole, with the auxiliary agency of governments for the respective subdivisions, will afford a happy issue to the experiment. It is well worth a fair and full experiment. With such powerful and obvious motives to union, affecting all parts of our country, while experience shall not have demonstrated its impracticability, there will always be reason to distrust the patriotism of those who, in any quarter, may endeavor to weaken its hands.

In contemplating the causes which may disturb our Union. it occurs as matter of serious concern, that any ground should have been furnished for characterizing parties by geographical discriminations,-northern and southern-Atlantic and western; whence designing men may endeavor to excite a belief that there is a real difference of local interests and views. One of the expedients of party to acquire influence within particular districts, is to misrepresent the opinions and aims of other districts. You cannot shield yourselves too much against the jealousies and heart burnings which spring from these misrepresentations: they tend to render alien to each other those who ought to be bound together by fraternal affection. The inhabitants of our western country have lately had a useful lesson on this head: they have seen, in the negotiation by the executive, and in the unanimous ratification by the senate of the treaty with Spain, and in the universal satisfaction at the event throughout the United States, a decisive proof how unfounded were the suspicions propagated among them of a policy in the general government and in the Atlantic states, unfriendly to their interests in regard to the Mississippi. They have been witnesses to the formation of two treaties, that with Great Britain and that with Spain, which secure to them everything they could desire, in respect to our foreign relations, towards confirming their prosperity. Will it not be their wisdom to rely for the preservation of these advantages on the union by which they were procured? will they not henceforth be deaf to those advisers, if such they are, who would sever them from their brethren and connect them with aliens?

To the efficacy and permanency of your Union, a government for the whole is indispensable. No alliances, however strict, between the parts can be an adequate substitute; they must inevitably experience the infractions and interruptions which all alliances, in all times, have experienced. Sensible of this momentous truth, you have improved upon your first essay, by the adoption of a constitution of government, better calculated than your former, for an intimate union, and for the efficacious management of your common concerns. This government, the offspring of our own choice, uninfluenced and unawed, adopted upon full investigation and mature deliberation, completely free in its principles, in the distribution of its powers, uniting security with energy, and containing within itself a provision for its own amendment, has a just claim to your confidence and your support. Respect for its authority, compliance with its laws, acquiescence in its measures, are duties enjoined by the fundamental maxims of true liberty. The basis of our political systems is the right of the people to make and to alter their constitutions of government.—But the constitution which at any time exists, until changed by an explicit and authentic act of the whole people. is sacredly obligatory upon all. The very idea of the power, and the right of the people to establish government, presuppose the duty of every individual to obey the established

All obstructions to the execution of the laws, all combinations and associations under whatever plausible character, with the real design to direct, control, counteract, or awe the regular deliberations and action of the constituted authorities, are destructive of this fundamental principle, and of fatal tendency.—They serve to organize faction, to give it an artificial and extraordinary force, to put in the place of the delegated will of the nation the will of party, often a small but artful and enterprising minority of the community; and, according to the alternate triumphs of different parties, to make the public administration the mirror of the ill concerted and incongruous projects of faction, rather than the organ of consistent and wholesome plans digested by common councils, and modified by mutual interests.

However combinations or associations of the above description may now and then answer popular ends, they are likely, in the course of time and things, to become potent engines, by which cunning, ambitious, and unprincipled men, will be enabled to subvert the power of the people, and to usurp for themselves the reins of government; destroying afterwards the very engines which have lifted them to unjust dominion.

Towards the preservation of your government and the permanency of your present happy state, it is requisite, not only that you steadily discountenance irregular opposition to its acknowledged authority, but also that you resist with care the spirit of innovation upon its principles, however specious the pretext. One method of assault may be to effect, in the forms of the constitution, alterations which will impair the energy of the system; and thus to undermine what cannot be directly overthrown. In all the changes to which you may be invited, remember that time and habit are at least as necessary to fix the true character of governments, as of other human institutions:-that experience is the surest standard by which to test the real tendency of the existing constitution of a country:-that facility in changes, upon the credit of mere hypothesis and opinion, exposes to perpetual change from the endless variety of hypothesis and opinion: and remember, especially, that for the efficient management of your common interests in a country so extensive as ours, a government of as much vigor as is consistent with the perfect security of liberty is indispensable. Liberty itself will find in such a government, with powers properly distributed and adjusted, its surest guardian. It is, indeed, little else than a name, where the government is too feeble to withstand the enterprises of faction, to confine each member of the society within the limits prescribed by the laws, and to maintain all in the secure and tranquil enjoyment of the rights of person and property.

I have already intimated to you the danger of parties in the state, with particular references to the founding them on geographical discrimination. Let me now take a more comprehensive view, and warn you in the most solemn manner against the baneful effects of the spirit of party generally.

This spirit, unfortunately, is inseparable from our nature, having its root in the strongest passions of the human mind.—It exists under different shapes in all governments, more or less stifled, controlled, or repressed; but in those of the popular form it is seen in its greatest rankness, and is truly their worst enemy.

The alternate domination of one faction over another, sharpened by the spirit of revenge natural to party dissension, which in different ages and countries has perpetrated the most horrid enormities, is itself a frightful despotism.—But this leads at length to a more formal and permanent despotism. The disorders and miseries which result, gradually incline the minds of men to seek security and repose in the absolute power of an individual; and, sooner or later, the chief of some prevailing faction, more able or more fortunate than his competitors, turns this disposition to the purpose of his own elevation on the ruins of public liberty.

Without looking forward to an extremity of this kind, (which nevertheless ought not to be entirely out of sight) the common and continual mischiefs of the spirit of party are sufficient to make it the interest and duty of a wise people to discourage and restrain it.

It serves always to distract the public councils, and enfeeble the public administration. It agitates the community with ill founded jealousies and false alarms; kindles the animosity of one part against another; foments occasional riot and insurrection. It opens the door to foreign influence and corruption, which finds a facilitated access to the government itself through the channels of party passions. Thus the policy and the will of one country are subjected to the policy and will of another.

There is an opinion that parties in free countries are useful checks upon the administration of the government, and serve to keep alive the spirit of liberty. This within certain limits is probably true; and in governments of a monarchial cast, patriotism may look with indulgence, if not with favor, upon the spirit of party. But in those of the popular character, in governments purely elective, it is a spirit not to be encouraged. From their natural tendency, it is certain there will always be enough of that spirit for every salutary purpose. And there being constant danger of excess, the effort ought to be, by force of public opinion, to mitigate and assuage it. A fire not to be quenched, it demands a uniform vigilance to prevent it bursting into a flame, lest instead of warming, it should consume.

of the public weal against invasions of the others, has been evinced by experiments ancient and modern: some of them in our country and under our own eyes.—To preserve them must be as necessary as to institute them. If, in the opinion of the people, the distribution or modification of the constitutional powers be in any particular wrong, let it be corrected by an amendment in the way which the constitution designates.—But let there be no change by usurpation; for though this, in one instance, may be the instrument of good, it is the customary weapon by which free governments are destroyed. The precedent must always greatly overbalance in permanent evil, any partial or transient benefit which the use can at any time yield.

Of all the dispositions and habits which lead to political prosperity, religion and morality are indispensable supports. In vain would that man claim the tribute of patriotism, who should labor to subvert these great pillars of human happiness, these firmest props of the duties of men and citizens. The mere politician, equally with the pious man, ought to respect and to cherish them. A volume could not trace all their connections with private and public felicity. Let it simply be asked, where is the security for property, for reputation, for life, if the sense of religious obligation desert the oaths which are the instruments of investigation in courts of justice? and let us with caution indulge the supposition that morality can be maintained without religion. Whatever may be conceded to the influence of refined education on minds of peculiar structure, reason and experience both forbid us to expect, that national morality can prevail in exclusion of religious principle.

It is substantially true, that virtue or morality is a necessary spring of popular government. The rule, indeed, extends with more or less force to every species of free government. Who that is a sincere friend to it can look with indifference upon attempts to shake the foundation of the fabric?

Promote, then, as an object of primary importance, institutions for the general diffusion of knowledge. In proportion as the structure of a government gives force to public opinion, it should be enlightened.

As a very important source of strength and security, cherish public credit. One method of preserving it is to use it as sparingly as possible, avoiding occasions of expense by cultivating peace, but remembering, also, that timely disbursements, to prepare for danger, frequently prevent much greater disbursements to repel it; avoiding likewise the accumulation of debt, not only by shunning occasions of expense, but by vigorous exertions, in time of peace, to discharge the debts which unavoidable wars may have occasioned, not ungenerously throwing upon posterity the burden which we ourselves ought to bear. The execution of these maxims belongs to your representatives, but it is necessary that public opinion should co-operate. To facilitate to them the performance of their duty, it is essential that you should practically bear in mind, that towards the payment of debts there must be revenue; that to have revenue there must be taxes; that no taxes can be devised which are not more or less inconvenient and unpleasant; that the intrinsic embarrassment inseparable from the selection of the proper object (which is always a choice of difficulties,) ought to be a decisive motive for a candid construction of the conduct of the government in making it, and for a spirit of acquiescence in the measures for obtaining revenue, which the public exigencies may at any time dictate.

Observe good faith and justice towards all nations; cultivate peace and harmony with all. Religion and morality enjoin this conduct, and can it be that good policy does not equally enjoin it? It will be worthy of a free, enlightened, and, at no distant period, a great nation, to give to mankind the magnanimous and too novel example of a people always guided by an exalted justice and benevolence. Who can doubt but, in the course of time and things, the fruits of such a plan would richly repay any temporary advantages which might be lost by a steady adherence to it; can it be that Providence has not connected the permanent felicity of a nation with its virtue? The experiment, at least, is recommended by every sentiment which ennobles human nature. Alas! is it rendered impossible by its vices?

In the execution of such a plan, nothing is more essential than that permanent, inveterate antipathies against particular nations and passionate attachments for others, should be excluded; and that, in place of them, just and amicable feelings towards all should be cultivated. The nation which indulges towards another an habitual hatred. or an habitual fondness, is in some degree a slave. It is a slave to its animosity or to its affection, either of which is sufficient to lead it astray from its duty and its interest. Antipathy in one nation against another, disposes each more readily to offer insult and injury, to lay hold of slight causes of umbrage, and to be haughty and intractable when accidental or trifling occasions of dispute occur. Hence, frequent collisions, obstinate, envenomed, and bloody contests. The nation, prompted by ill will and resentment. sometimes impels to war the government, contrary to the best calculations of policy. The government sometimes participates in the national propensity, and adopts through passion what reason would reject; at other times, it makes the animosity of the nation subservient to projects of hostility, instigated by pride, ambition, and other sinister and pernicious motives. The peace often, sometimes perhaps the liberty of nations, has been the victim.

So likewise, a passionate attachment of one nation for another produces a variety of evils. Sympathy for the favorite nation, facilitating the illusion of an imaginary common interest, in cases where no real common interest exists, and infusing into one the enmities of the other, betrays the former into a participation in the guarrels and wars of the latter, without adequate inducements or justifications. It leads also to concessions, to the favorite nation, of privileges denied to others, which is apt doubly to injure the nation making the concessions, by unnecessarily parting with what ought to have been retained, and by exciting jealousy, ill will, and a disposition to retaliate in the parties from whom equal privileges are withheld; and it gives to ambitious, corrupted or deluded citizens who devote themselves to the favorite nation, facility to betray or sacrifice the interests of their own country, without odium, sometimes even with popularity; gilding with the appearances of a virtuous sense of obligation, a commendable deference for public opinion, or a laudable zeal for public good, the base or foolish compliances of ambition, corruption, or infatuation.

As avenues to foreign influence in innumerable ways, such attachments are particularly alarming to the truly enlightened and independent patriot. How many opportunities do they afford to tamper with domestic factions, to practice the arts of seduction, to mislead public opinion, to influence or awe the public councils!—Such an attachment of a small or weak towards a great and powerful nation, dooms the former to be the satellite of the latter.

Against the insidious wiles of foreign influence, (I conjure you to believe me fellow citizens), the jealousy of a free people ought to be constantly awake; since history and experience prove, that foreign influence is one of the most baneful foes of republican government. But that jealousy, to be useful, must be impartial, else it becomes the instrument of the very influence to be avoided, instead of a defense against it. Excessive partiality for one foreign nation and excessive dislike for another, cause those whom they actuate to see danger only on one side, and serve to veil and even second the arts of influence on the other. Real patriots, who may resist the intrigues of the favorite, are liable to become suspected and odious; while its tools and dupes usurp the applause and confidence of the people, to surrender their interests.

doubt but, in the course of time and things, the fruits of such a plan would richly repay any temporary advantages which might be lost by a steady adherence to it; can it be with them as little political connection as possible. So far as we have already formed engagements, let them be fulfilled | public records and other evidences of my conduct must witwith perfect good faith:-Here let us stop.

Europe has a set of primary interests, which to us have none, or a very remote relation. Hence, she must be engaged in frequent controversies, the causes of which are essentially foreign to our concerns. Hence, therefore, it must be unwise in us to implicate ourselves, by artificial ties, in the ordinary vicissitudes of her politics, or the ordinary combinations and collisions of her friendships or enmities.

Our detached and distant situation invites and enables us to pursue a different course. If we remain one people, under an efficient government, the period is not far off when we may defy material injury from external annoyance; when we may take such an attitude as will cause the neutrality we may at any time resolve upon, to be scrupulously respected: when belligerent nations, under the impossibility of making acquisitions upon us, will not lightly hazard the giving us provocation, when we may choose peace or war, as our interest, guided by justice, shall counsel.

Why forego the advantages of so peculiar a situation? Why quit our own to stand upon foreign ground? Why, by interweaving our destiny with that of any part of Europe, entangle our peace and prosperity in the toils of European ambition, rivalship, interest, humor, or caprice?

It is our true policy to steer clear of permanent alliance with any portion of the foreign world; so far, I mean, as we are now at liberty to do it; for let me not be understood as capable of patronizing infidelity to existing engagements. I hold the maxim no less applicable to public than private affairs, that honesty is always the best policy. I repeat it, therefore, let those engagements be observed in their genuine sense. But in my opinion, it is unnecessary, and would be unwise to extend them.

Taking care always to keep ourselves by suitable establishments, on a respectable defensive posture, we may safely trust to temporary alliances for extraordinary emergencies.

Harmony, and a liberal intercourse with all nations, are recommended by policy, humanity, and interest. But even our commercial policy should hold an equal and impartial hand; neither seeking nor granting exclusive favors or preferences; consulting the natural course of things; diffusing and diversifying by gentle means the streams of commerce, but forcing nothing; establishing with powers so disposed, in order to give trade a stable course, to define the rights of our merchants, and to enable the government to support them, conventional rules of intercourse, the best that present circumstances and mutual opinion will permit, but temporary, and liable to be from time to time abandoned or varied as experience and circumstances shall dictate; constantly keeping in view, that it is folly in one nation to look for disinterested favors from another; that it must pay with a portion of its independence for whatever it may accept under that character; that by such acceptance, it may place itself in the condition of having given equivalents for nominal favors, and yet of being reproached with ingratitude for not giving more. There can be no greater error than to expect, or calculate upon real favors from nation to nation. It is an illusion which experience must cure, which a just pride ought to discard.

In offering to you, my countrymen, these counsels of an old and affectionate friend, I dare not hope they will make the strong and lasting impression I could wish; that they will control the usual current of the passions, or prevent our nation from running the course which has hitherto marked the destiny of nations, but if I may even flatter myself that they may be productive of some partial benefit, some occasional good; that they may now and then recur to moderate the fury of party spirit, to warn against the mischiefs of foreign intrigue, to guard against the impostures of pretended patriotism; this hope will be a full recompense for the solicitude for your welfare by which they have been ness to you and to the world. To myself, the assurance of my own conscience is, that I have, at least, believed myself to be guided by them.

In relation to the still subsisting war in Europe, my proclamation of the 22d of April, 1793, is the index to my plan. Sanctioned by your approving voice, and by that of your representatives in both houses of congress, the spirit of that measure has continually governed me, uninfluenced by any attempts to deter or divert me from it.

After deliberate examination, with the aid of the best lights I could obtain, I was well satisfied that our country, under all the circumstances of the case, had a right to take, and was bound, in duty and interest, to take a neutral position. Having taken it, I determined, as far as should depend upon me, to maintain it with moderation, perseverance and firmness.

The considerations which respect the right to hold this conduct, it is not necessary on this occasion to detail. I will only observe that, according to my understanding of the matter, that right, so far from being denied by any of the belligerent powers, has been virtually admitted by all.

The duty of holding a neutral conduct may be inferred, without any thing more, from the obligation which justice and humanity impose on every nation, in cases in which it is free to act, to maintain inviolate the relations of peace and amity towards other nations.

The inducements of interest for observing that conduct will best be referred to your own reflections and experience. With me, a predominant motive has been to endeavor to gain time to our country to settle and mature its yet recent institutions, and to progress, without interruption, to that degree of strength, and consistency which is necessary to give it, humanly speaking, the command of its own fortunes.

Though in reviewing the incidents of my administration, I am unconscious of intentional error, I am nevertheless too sensible of my defects not to think it probable that I may have committed many errors. Whatever they may be, I fervently beseech the Almighty to avert or mitigate the evils to which they may tend. I shall also carry with me the hope that my country will never cease to view them with indulgence; and that, after 45 years of my life dedicated to its service, with an upright zeal, the faults of incompetent abilities will be consigned to oblivion, as myself must soon be to the mansions of rest.

Relying on its kindness in this as in other things, and actuated by that fervent love towards it, which is so natural to a man who views in it the native soil of himself and his progenitors for several generations; I anticipate with pleasing expectation that retreat in which I promise myself to realize, without alloy, the sweet enjoyment of partaking, in the midst of my fellow citizens, the benign influence of good laws under a free government—the ever favorite object of my heart, and the happy reward, as I trust, of our mutual cares, labors and dangers.

Mr. BORAH and Mr. BARBOUR addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Idaho. Mr. BARBOUR. Will the Senator from Idaho permit me to present a request for unanimous consent?

Mr. BORAH. Certainly.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, I request that the article by David Lawrence, entitled "Farewell to Washington", which appeared in the United States News of February 18. 1935, be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of Washington's Farewell Address, which has just been read by the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. Austin].

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"FAREWELL TO WASHINGTON"-THE IGNOBLE CHANT OF THOSE WHO WE HAVE OUTLIVED THE CONSTITUTION IS HEARD ONCE MORE AS CONGRESS CONSIDERS LEGISLATION PLAINLY IN VIOLATION OF CONSTITUTIONAL PRINCIPLES AND PRECEDENTS—A CALL FOR STATES-

By David Lawrence

To the Spirit of George Washington:

Within a few days—on your birthday anniversary—Members of the Seventy-fourth Congress will assemble to listen to the reading of your Farewell Address.

The meeting will be perfunctory. And your solemn words which once thrilled the hearts of our people and stirred throughout the world an unstinted measure of devotion will pass into the echoes of the Capitol as merely the plea of a bygone age too far removed from our lives to be meaningful, too remote from our present-day experiences to be pertinent to our welfers. experiences to be pertinent to our welfare.

For there have arisen voices which now challenge the truth indeed, the wisdom—of what you warned us in parting.

These voices, in no conscious antipathy to patriotism but in the mistaken ardor of a new design for living, would brush aside the tenets of the advice you so wisely imparted to your countrymen as the shadows of mortal life lengthened around you.

Yours was then no partisan zeal. You did not speak the language of ambition nor betray the lust of power. You had won all the glory that mankind could bestow.

RECIPROCAL CHECKS IN OUR GOVERNMENT

From the depths of a heart which had known the sacrifices of From the depths of a heart which had known the sacrinces of Valley Forge and the bitter sting of ungrateful contemporaries, as you sought to steer clear of entanglements abroad, came words of caution, oft quoted only with respect to foreign relations.

Your appeal for the perpetuation of the Constitution and the great principles of fairness and equity which it embodied was directed even more to those at home who might some day seek to alter and underwine if not to destroy our form of government.

alter and undermine, if not to destroy, our form of government.

With prophetic insight, you penned these immortal lines:

"It is important that the habits of thinking in a free country should inspire caution in those intrusted with its administration to confine themselves within their respective constitutional spheres, avoiding in the exercise of the powers of one department to encroach upon another.

"The spirit of encroachment tends to consolidate the powers of all the departments in one, and thus to create, whatever the form of government, a real despotism.

"But let there be no change by usurpation; for though this, in one instance, may be the instrument of good, it is the customary weapon by which free governments are destroyed.

"The precedent must always greatly overbalance in permanent evil any partial or transient benefit which the use can at any time yield."

USURPATIONS IMPERIL OUR LIBERTIES

You told us also to "cherish public credit" and observed that "one method of preserving it is to use it as sparingly as possible." You warned us, too, that one scheme of assault upon our Government might be "to effect, in the forms of the Constitution, alterations which will impair the energy of the system; and thus to undermine what cannot be directly overthrown."

You bade us remember that in all the changes to which we might be invited "time and habits are at least as necessary to fix the true character of governments as of other human institutions—that experience is the surest standard by which to test the real tendency of the existing constitution of a country."

You did not besitate to declare that liberty itself would find in

You did not hesitate to declare that liberty itself would find in a government such as ours, with powers properly distributed and adjusted, its "surest guardian", and you did not fail to include in your definition of liberty "the rights of person and property."

COUNSEL FROM RIPE LESSONS OF EXPERIENCE

Only 138 years have passed since your Farewell Address was delivered. Reckoned in the broad spans of time, in the long life of nations, in the centuries of human history, we are still a youthful people.

Your estimate of the perils faced by democracy was no empty choice of words as to the future. You knew then the battles which had been fought by English-speaking peoples for the cause of human freedom. To you Magna Carta was not the shibboleth of a doddering old deal nor the feeble protest of a selfish group of money changers.

Tyranny was as femiliar to you and your forebears as it was in the earlier epochs that gave birth to Christian civilization. The Revolution, which you and your colleagues fought to victory, was a crusade of principle against caprice, freedom above despotism, and individual right of the many above the dictatorship of the Principles of right and wrong were in your day as deeply ingrained in the minds of men as when eloquently proclaimed in the ancient democracies which first gave us the light of fundamental knowledge.

But somehow today there has come over our land a strange

We are told that to speak of liberty is to prate of a meaning-less patriotism brought forth only to mask the cruelties of those who would hide their own exploitations behind the phrases of Fourth of July orations.

RELIGION, TOO, A VICTIM OF CYNICISM

If this were but a single manifestation of disregard for old forms of government, for traditions of a constitutionalism supposedly obsolete, we might be disposed to mistrust our own fidelity to things old-fashioned and accept these innovations as the spirit of a new day, of a new era, of a new deal in the application of our governmental mechanism to this vast terrain and huge population which we now embrace in the 48 States.

But, unfortunately, the same cynicism brushes aside morality and religion, too. You wrote in your Farewell Address that of all the dispositions and habits which lead to prosperity, "religion and morality are indispensable supports." To quote from your

"Let it simply be asked where is the security for property, for reputation, for life, if the sense of religious obligation desert the oaths which are the instruments of investigation in courts of

and let us with caution induige the supposition that morality can be maintained without religion.

"Whatever may be conceded to the influence of refined education on minds of peculiar structure, reason and experience both forbid us to expect that national morality can prevail in exclusion of religious principle."

PASSING YEARS CANNOT DULL VITAL IDEALS

With us there has been, of course, no church interwoven with With us there has been, of course, no church interwoven with the State, but we have, in generations past, exalted religion as the inspiration of human behavior. Abroad in these very times, however, the contempt for religion grows apace as Russia and Germany have struck down the rights of the churches to teach their own ways of allegiance to the God of their fathers. In our own country there is a calloused indifference to religious principle as the fruits of man's toll are wantonly appropriated in orgies of waste and destruction. waste and destruction.

But, you were living 138 years ago.

We are constantly being reminded of the distance between you and us and of the transformations which invention and the genius of creative minds have wrought in even this relatively short period of world history.

The are, to be sure, some among us who see clearly that time and distance are merely physical factors measuring, perhaps, the intensity of human action or reaction, but erasing none of the qualities of character and fair dealing which your Farewell Address bequeathed to us as the immutable principles of American constitutionalism.

The messes of our people have a second among the principles of the process of our people have a second principle.

The masses of our people, however, are at the moment the prey of demagogues whose voices ring in our ears.

Having sent to Congress men pledged by oath to support the Constitution and to remain faithful to the trust imposed in them, bewildered democracy awaits the inevitable hour of courageous statesmanship.

But, alas, we have no independent Congress. We have, in the parlance of the day, a group of rubber-stamp Senators and Representatives, who, in the interest of political submissiveness, refuse to accept the real responsibilities of legislation.

LET CONGRESS LEGISLATE, NOT ABDICATE

This may seem like a harsh condemnation, and there are, of course, notable exceptions in both Houses, but this comment is born, nevertheless, of a deep-seated fear that only blunt words of truth will awaken among our people such sensibility to danger as may impel them to issue to their chosen representatives a mandate to legislate and not abdicate.

The insidious doctrine, made famous by Machiavelli, that the end justifies the means has wrecked our governmental customs, laws, and traditions by artifice and subterfuge, as well as by political preferment and spoliation. These excursions into the realm of political expediency have brought us usurpation after usurpation, political expediency have brought us usurpation after usurpation, the mixing of administrative and judicial processes, and the piling up of orders and rules without hearing or trial.

We have witnessed the alarming growth of the idea that it is the proper function of the legislative and executive branches of the Government to conspire to evade the Constitution, leaving it wholly to the slow-moving processes of judicial determination to correct these wrongs, albeit such abuses are not remediable and the damage in the interim is incalculable.

No greater betrayal of public trust can be imagined than the passage under the guise of evolution of an act known to be in violation of the precedents and principles of American constitutionalism. Nor are such steps any more justified because of the ill-conceived notion that in an emergency there is but one course of action or that wisdom in public policy is finite.

DEMAGOGUES DO NOT SPEAK FOR THE PEOPLE

The American people cannot long be misled by impassioned appeals to bias and prejudice nor drawn far by the promises of a synthetic prosperity through the tempting wiles of a fascinating empiricism. In moments of calm reflection some day they will visit their wrath upon all who will have betrayed them.

We shall witness, in the meantime unfortunately, the fulfillment of your warnings as the scheming groups among us seek to undermine that which they dare not overthrow.

These would-be reformers make no secret of their desire to say mine that which they dare not overthrow.

These would-be reformers make no secret of their desire to say farewell to Washington, farewell to nineteenth century liberalism, farewell to laissez faire and rugged individualism, terms and epithets invented primarily to camouflage a crass contempt for the American principles laid down by the fathers of this Republic.

But even as we hear the farewell to Washington chanted with ignoble hypocrisy in the name of a people presumably emancipated from the voke of a system of profits or losses, presumably freed from the witchcraft of business infidels who worship Mammon alone, there seems to come to us a faith that militant leaders will arise once more in America.

We shall dealers our independence of the disciples of chaos

We shall declare our independence of the disciples of chaos and enlist again in the cause of freedom.

We shall pledge anew our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honor to uphold the principles of your Farewell Address against all who would use government, its powers and its privileges, to break down our currency, to bring hardship to the employed, to withhold succor from the unemployed; in short, against those would-be spokesmen for the common man who are in fact his most dangerous enemies—the arch foes of our national welfare and of the Republic you once endowed with the spirit of undying

GEORGE WASHINGTON'S FOREIGN POLICY

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I wish to occupy the time of the Senate briefly upon a matter which seems to me peculiarly pertinent to the occasion of the reading of Washington's Farewell Address. I ask that the clerk read the editorial, which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read, as requested. The legislative clerk read as follows:

[From the Washington Post, Friday, Jan. 12, 1934]

QUOTATIONS FROM WASHINGTON

It is perhaps too much to hope that some day an advocate of isolation will embroider the theme in public without using as his text that historic passage from Washington's Farewell Address: "The great rule of conduct for us in regard to foreign nations is,

"The great rule of conduct for us in regard to foreign nations is, in extending our commercial relations, to have with them as little political connection as possible."

And it is also perhaps too much to hope that some day a speaker on this theme will arise with sufficient intellectual honesty—and knowledge of Washington's political philosophy—to cap the above quotation with another from the writings of our first President. Certainly it is equally worth recalling that Washington foresaw a future "when, our institutions being firmly consolidated and working with complete success, we might safely and perhaps beneficially take part in the consultations held by foreign states for the advantage of the nations."

Senator Boyan in his trenchant speech to the Council on Foreign

Senator Borah, in his trenchant speech to the Council on Foreign Relations last Monday night, spoke as though the foreign policy which was judicious in the eighteenth century must by that token be the judicious policy today. It is useful to recall that, judging by his published writings, Washington himself would have denied any such static concept, so contradictory to the dynamic character of a changing civilization.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, when I read that impressive editorial I concluded that the Post had been imposed upon or in some way misled. In my brief readings with reference to Washington and his policies I had never happened to come across the second alleged quotation found in the editorial. I felt that the editorial contained either something startlingly new or something startlingly false. I immediately began an investigation, which I have continued from time to time during the last year, to find when and where Washington used the language attributed to him in the second quotation found in the editorial.

I first took the matter up with the Legislative Reference Service, which made a thorough investigation of the matter and reported to me under date of January 15, 1934:

I am obliged to report that we have not found this in Washington's writings.

I ask that the letter from the Legislative Reference Service be published in full in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Then, being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LIBRARY OF CONGRESS Washington, January 15, 1934.

Hon. WILLIAM E. BORAH,

Hon. William E. Borah,

United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

Dear Senators: In response to your telephone request of January 12 for the source of the second quotation in the editorial of the Washington Post for Friday, January 12, under the caption "Quotations from Washington", I am obliged to report that we have not found this in Washington's Writings. We find the quotation used by George H. Blakeslee in his Recent Foreign Policy of the United States, New York, 1925, on page 20, but in crediting the authorship to Washington, Blakeslee does not give any reference to any one of his papers.

We have made a search through the most likely parts of Washington's Writings but fail to find it. We have also called in the assistance of Mr. Fitzpatrick, the editor of the new complete edition of Washington's Writings. He did not recognize it and said that it would probably take a careful reading of all of his published writings to demonstrate that he either did or did not say or write it.

There is one other possibility and that is a letter addressed to Prof. George H. Blakeslee and ask him in what one of Washington's writings the quotation was found. If you care to have me do this, I shall be glad to undertake it at a word from you.

Very respectfully,

H. H. B. MEYER, Director Legislative Reference Service.

Mr. BORAH. It will be noted that the Legislative Reference Service refers to a book published by Prof. George H. Blakeslee on foreign affairs, which it was thought might afford some information upon the subject. Examination of that volume disclosed this quotation:

Washington at least regarded the policy of isolation as partially a temporary one; he looked forward to the time when the United States would meet with other nations to consider world affairs. He spoke of the future, "when, our institutions being firmly consolidated and working with complete success, we might safely and perhaps beneficially take part in the consultations held by foreign States for the advantage of the nations."

Correspondence with Professor Blakeslee disclosed that the professor did not know whence this quotation came. I ask to have incorporated in the RECORD a letter from Professor Blakeslee under date of January 24, 1934.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

> CLARK UNIVERSITY Worcester, Mass., January 24, 1934.

Mr. H. H. B. MEYER,

Director Legislative Reference Service,

Library of Congress, Washington, D. C.

My Dear Mr. Meyer: The quotation to which you refer in your letter of the 16th was not taken directly from Washington's works, but from an article which placed in quotation marks the words I attributed to Washington, and stated that Washington used them in 1792 in some communication to Congress.

You may find the quotation in Horace M. Kallen, The League of Nations and American Foreign Policy, in the Journal of Interna-

Nations and American Foreign Policy, in the Journal of International Relations (vol. 12, no. 2, October 1921, p. 276).

I should be interested to know if Dr. Kallen was incorrect in his quotation.

Sincerely yours,

G. H. BLAKESLEE.

Mr. BORAH. In the letter of Professor Blakeslee is a reference to Horace M. Kallen, who is the author of an article appearing in the Journal of International Relations, volume 12, no. 2, October 1921, at page 276. Examination of that article disclosed the following, speaking of Washington:

And, finally, he recognized that the time would come when we should be able to hold our own and to participate in the politics of the world, "when, our institutions being firmly consolidated and working with complete success, we might safely and perhaps beneficially take part in the consultations held by foreign states for the advantage of the nations." Indeed, some competent students have shown ample evidence for holding that both Washington and Jefferson urged not isolation in itself but freedom from entanglement in purely European matters, so that the United States might be the more free to intervene in matters of world interest and general justice to humanity.

A correspondence followed with Professor Kallen, and the professor did not know whence this quotation came. He was unable apparently to get any information upon the subject. I ask that the letter from his secretary upon that subject be incorporated in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be clumsy, impudent forgery. It carries the brand of criminal printed in the RECORD, as follows:

> THE NEW SCHOOL FOR SOCIAL RESEARCH New York, February 28, 1934.

Mr. H. H. B. MEYER

Director Legislative Reference Service,
Library of Congress, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. MEYER: I must apologize for delaying so long in replying to your letter of February 2 to Dr. Kallen.

Complete files of Dr. Kallen's work in 1921 are not available. We complete files of Dr. Kallen's work in 1921 are not available. We have on hand no copy of the article to which you refer, and Dr. Kallen does not remember it. The secretary who assisted him at that time is no longer in his employ. There is, of course, some possibility that she quoted incorrectly. I have myself looked through such of Washington's works as are available, and have been unable to find that passage.

to find that passage.

I regret that I am unable to furnish the information you request. Thank you for so courteously calling it to our attention.

Yours very truly,

MADLYN MILLER, Secretary.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I was not investigating so much with a view of ascertaining whether this was a part of the writings of Washington as to ascertain, if I could, who was the author of it. I had formed the opinion immediately upon reading the editorial that George Washington had never uttered any such view, but I was anxious to find the authorship, if possible. I wrote to a number of distinguished educators and historians, people whom I thought would have some knowledge upon the subject, and while I do not propose to incorporate all their letters in the RECORD. the answer was one and the same. No one knew of the quotation or whence it came after it was discovered in Professor Kallen's article.

Finally, I addressed a letter to the secretary of the American Historical Association under date December 28, 1934. I ask that the letter be incorporated in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter is as follows:

DECEMBER 28, 1934.

Secretary American Historical Society,
The Mayflower Hotel, Washington, D. C.
DEAR MR. READ: The followinging quotation has been attributed to George Washington by different writers, editorially and other-working with complete success, we might safely and perhaps beneficially take part in the consultations held by foreign states for the advantage of the nations."

I have made every effort to ascertain when, or if at all, Washington made any such statement. I have been unable to find this, or anything similar to it. I have also consulted numerous people whom I thought would likely know where this quotation could be found in Washington's writings. I have received no information on the subject from any source.

It occurred to me that you, or someone connected with the historical association, might be able to advise me whether this is correctly attributed to Washington, and if so, when and where the statement was made and where it may be found in his works. I am very anxious, as a matter of historical truth, to know, first, whether any such statement was ever made by Washington; and, secondly, where it may be found.

Thanking you in advance for your kindness in giving me such information as you may, I am,

Most respectfully,

(Signed) WM. E. BORAH.

Mr. BORAH. Under date of February 16, 1935, I received an answer to that letter from the American Historical Association, which I ask to have read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read as requested. The legislative clerk read as follows:

> AMERICAN HISTORICAL ASSOCIATION. Washington, D. C., February 16, 1935.

Senator WILLIAM E. BORAH,

Washington, D. C.
DEAR SENATOR BORAH: I have made careful investigation through various scholars as to the quotation which you submitted at the time of the meeting of the American Historical Association. I can find no warrant for the statement which you quote in your letter of December 28. I think I may confidently state that Washington never said what he is therein assumed to have said.

Yours sincerely.

DEXTER PERKINS, Secretary.

Mr. BORAH. It is clear to me, Mr. President, that this statement attributed to George Washington is a crude, 1 falsehood upon its face. In style, in manner of expression, in substance, and in thought it is manifestly a weak but vicious

Even had Washington entertained such an opinion he would not have expressed it in such feeble and impotent terms.

It was forged for a purpose; that purpose was to plant in our historic literature a view contrary to all views expressed and opinions entertained by the Father of our Country.

'76 AND '36

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President, I have gone over the measures of national welfare, including the financial operations, of the administration of George Washington, the American statesman whose birthday we celebrate as that of "The Father of his Country."

He was the presiding head of that new deal which is ever new-the cause of American freedom, which is expressed in the Constitution of 1787 by the convention over which he presided.

He was the presiding head of that first administration, which was the first administration under the Constitution of the United States.

There were some outstanding features of that administration, though it had no "brain trust" of assistant professors to guide its steps, which are well worth the prayerful consideration and even the emulation of the present day and generation, including the Seventy-fourth Congress.

I am not bringing up the achievements of that first administration simply for the purpose of invoking an odious comparison. Indeed, if the comparison is odious, it is not my fault, but the fault of history, and more particularly the fault of those who by their public actions and declarations make the comparison odious.

It will certainly do no harm to anyone today to know that there were statesmen in those days, notwithstanding the dearth of professors to make "brain trusts." George Washington picked a Cabinet-Jefferson, Hamilton, Randolph, Pickering, Osgood, Wolcott, Knox, Lee-of practical patriots who had brains enough to run the Government without tutors from New York colleges. If we do not dare to take that risk today, it is certainly not the fault of George Washington, nor of the people of the United States.

One of the outstanding features of those days was the usual absence of Treasury deficits. The first four Presidents-Washington, Adams, Jefferson, and Madison-found no particular necessity or virtue in deficits in time of peace. In the 24 years from the first inauguration of Washington down to the War of 1812, there were only 5 years with small deficits, while the general rule was a Treasury surplus. In the occasional year that showed a deficit, the amount of it seldom reached one-third of the amount of ordinary receipts. It is only under the new deal of this latter day—the latter day saints of the "brain trust"—that the deficit equals 100 percent of the ordinary receipts, and the United States Chamber of Commerce voicing 1,500 major companies demanding of the Government a two billion slash on the ground that-

All experience proves that there must be an end sooner or later to government deficits.

Washington had three small deficits in the first 8 years of the United States Government.

Adams had one deficit in 4 years.

Thomas Jefferson had no deficits in 8 years. His was the first administration that bore the name "Republican", though also Jefferson has been called a Democrat until disowned by the new deal. Under the new deal of today Jefferson would be known as a "Tory" in speeches from the White House. That is because the administration has become federalist, while the Jeffersonians, whether they may call themselves Republicans or Democrats, are in principle anti-Federalists today as 130 years ago.

Washington had few deficits and no emergency. Jefferson had no deficits and no emergency. Yet they are known to the American people and to history as patriots and statesmen. Their new deal was Americanism. Their new deal was based upon the Declaration of Independence, the Constitution, and the Bill of Rights. It was not only a fair deal, a sound deal based upon common sense and common honesty, but it was popular both here and abroad.

It brought to this country the free man and freedomloving immigrants of the world.

It inspired the confidence and faith of the American people, both labor and capital, farmers and home builders.

It inspired the organization of 10 neighboring South American republics—all based on the American Constitution and the Bill of Rights.

Washington and the early Presidents succeeding him, I repeat, had few deficits, and those only nominal; and they had no foreign entanglements and no emergency. They had no need, no urge, they had no political ambition requiring an emergency to put it over. They had no motive or purpose to evade the Constitution. They believed in the Constitution and the Bill of Rights. They needed no emergency as a pretext for eyading or suspending the Constitution. Hence they planned no emergency.

In the nature of the case, an emergency, if it is going to fool all the people or most of the people very long, must be a well-planned emergency.

Likewise, in the nature of the case, an emergency that can be forecast a year or more or 2 years ahead—as in the case of the 1936 emergency, for which we are asked to vote the four-billion lump subject to the allocation of the Executive—is a planned emergency that is to be maintained by the continuance of the N. R. A. to crack down industry, and the A. A. A. to plow under the crops, kill the pigs, and otherwise destroy the productive income of the United States.

George Washington had no planned emergency, and therefore no emergency. Thomas Jefferson had no planned emergency, and therefore no emergency. The Adamses had no emergency except that of the Presidential election which eliminated them from the White House. It seems that both of the Adamses needed a few millions subject to the allocation of the Executive to afford the work relief needed to hold their political jobs. They needed at least a four-million lump.

In the days of George Washington the total ordinary receipts of the Federal Government were around $4,000,000, or one-tenth of 1 percent of the annual regular expenditures of the Federal Government today.

Let us suppose that George Washington, when the Second Congress of his new deal convened in 1791, had gone before Congress with a message to this effect:

Gentlemen, I see no vast need of relief this year, which can be taken care of with an appropriation of, say, $800,000. But I foresee that next year, which happens to be Presidential election year, we shall need five times that amount, or $4,000,000, for emergency in addition to the usual $4,000,000 to run the Government. Therefore, I demand that in addition to the regular cost of government you appropriate $4,000,000 in one sum subject to the allocation of the Executive.

Suppose, I say, George Washington had gone before the Second Congress of our American new deal, something over a year ahead of the 1792 election, and made that demand—that Congress abrogate its constitutional power over appropriations, abdicate its powers under article I, ignore its sworn duty to uphold the Constitution, and vote a four-million lump subject to the allocation of the Executive. Would the people of the United States during the past 100 years have been celebrating the birthday of Washington as the Father of our Country?

Would we be here today reading Washington's Farewell Address?

Would we be here extolling Washington as the Father of our Country or as the father of a Tammany Hall system of irresponsible finance applied to Federal Government?

Would the admiring people of the United States have built here in their Capital City a Washington Monument 555 feet high? No. More likely they would have dug here a Washington grave 555 feet deep.

It is doubtful if Washington ever would have been reelected. More likely, Washington and his four-million lump would have expired with one term, and either Hamilton, Adams, Randolph, or Jefferson would have been given Washington's second term in the White House.

Washington had the backbone, the brains, the statesmanship to resist all temptation to squander public funds to build up a powerful centralized government. Indeed, he had the character and foresight to refuse a third term, which might well have drifted into a Federal dictatorship or monarchy, and thereby have wrecked the Republic. He had too much regard for the future of his country to wreck it upon the rocks of financial irresponsibility.

The same is true of Washington's successors—Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, and the Adamses. They believed in government economically administered, with the least burden upon productive industry. They builded for all time—not for a momentary hullabaloo.

In the year 1800 the total ordinary Government disbursements were only $2.04 per capita. Today, besides nearly $40 per capita for the ordinary expenditures of government, we are asked to appropriate a four-billion lump subject to the allocation of the Executive, to meet the emergency of 1936. That is to say, on top of the $40 per capita to meet the actual cost of government, we must give the chief candidate a sum equal to $100 per voter for each of the 40,000,000 voters of the United States, subject to the allocation of the Executive candidate.

Had George Washington made such a demand upon the Second Congress, the result might well have been an impeachment trial instead of a rubber-stamp acquiescence.

Of course, Alexander Hamilton, as Secretary of the Treasury, was not made according to the financial specifications of Henry Morgenthau, Jr. Had such an unthinkable demand come from Washington, what would have happened? Hamilton would have resigned promptly and declared his candidacy for the Presidency on the issue of saving the country's financial future.

It will be noted that under Washington's immediate successors in the White House the public interest-bearing debt of the United States was reduced from $15.63 per capita in July 1800 to $7.34 in 1810. The early fathers believed in reducing the public debt and reducing the interest burden on taxpayers, producers, and consumers.

Today, under a new deal which, it eventually begins to appear, knows neither financial stability nor the interests of industry and seems to care nothing for public faith and confidence, the present interest-bearing debt of $28,000,000,000 amounts to $230 per capita; and if we go to the limit of the $35,000,000,000 named in the bill passed here a few days ago, the debt will stand at nearly $300 per capita, or 40 times the per capita debt of this Republic in the days when Republican-Democrats were true to their oaths to support the Constitution.

From the inauguration of Washington down to Madison, just before the War of 1812, the annual interest on the public debt averaged around $3,000,000, or less than one-third the average annual revenue collections from customs dues. From $3,490,000 in 1794, the interest burden dropped to $2,465,000 in 1811—a reduction of one-third in yearly interest, because of the determination of the first four Presidents to maintain the credit of the United States and keep down the tax burden on productive industry for the support of labor.

In the present fiscal year of 1935 the interest on our public debt exceeds the total revenue receipts from income taxes. It not only imperils public credit and destroys financial confidence in the Government, but it stands like the Leaning Tower of Pisa as a threat to industrial enterprise.

This interest burden—estimated in the President's Budget at $835,000,000 for 1935 and $875,000,000 for 1936—amounts to $28 per family on the 30,000,000 families that eventually pay it in increased living costs.

In 1810 the entire interest-bearing debt was only $7.34 per capita, and the interest thereon was only a few cents per capita.

In 1840 the public debt itself was only 21 cents per capita, and the interest burden per capita could be paid with one of those big 2-cent coppers.

From the time of Washington to that of Lincoln, and thence on through the administration of Theodore Roosevelt down to Wilson, before the World War, no chamber of commerce was found in this country voicing the demands of business to slash Government outlays two billions, and no warning was given that the Budget must be balanced to save business, which employs labor.

However much I may differ from the distinguished Senator from Kentucky [Mr. Logan] on some national questions. such as the tariff, I am in hearty accord with his observation in this Chamber on Tuesday, February 19, when he declared, in discussing this four billion lump joint resolution:

We are taking from those people in the United States who employ labor, and we must look to them to employ labor.

The Government itself has no money. All it does is to collect or borrow from those who engage in productive industries by the employment of labor. Taking from productive industry takes from the wages of productive labor. The politician robs Peter to pay Paul. However it may benefit or gratify the ambition of the politician, it is hard on both Peter and Paul, because both are eventual losers, and the entire body economic and politic suffers waste and demoralization by the bold experiment with its lives, liberty, and property.

If there ever was a time when Democrats and Republicans and Progressives should get together to save their country from brain trust experiments in government and honor the Father of his Country by real service in the cause of the Republic, instead of by mere lip service, that time has now arrived in this the first session of the Seventy-fourth Congress; and there is no parliamentary body on earth in which this mission of statesmanship can be so fittingly begun as in the Senate of the United States.

It was once well said:

If ve love me, keep my commandments.

Let us keep the commandments of George Washington.

House Resolution 27

Whereas great numbers of persons have been lynched in the United States in the last 50 years with less than a dozen convictions resulting therefrom, and, moreover, that in each of these convictions only nominal prison terms were given the lynchers; and, furthermore, during the year 1934 there were a total of 18 lynchings, which is a travesty on justice in our country; and Whereas further miscarriage of justice should be prevented:

Therefore, be it

VESTED INTEREST IN PUBLIC SPENDING-ARTICLE BY SENATOR BAILEY

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a very able article, entitled "Vested Interest in Public Spending", written by the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. Barley] and published in the Saturday Evening Post of February 2, 1935.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

There has been and there is now current a decided improvement There has been and there is now current a decided improvement in business—our retail merchants and their clerks will tell you so. For more than a year business failures have been rare. The volume of business and industry is about 17 percent better than in January 1933, according to the charts. That was the low point that preceded the acute collapse of March 1933. From the low point of the March collapse, business and industry are about 27 percent better. But I prefer the comparison with January 1933, since the March condition was one of acute papir. So we never the better. better. But I prefer the comparison with January 1833, since the March condition was one of acute panic. So we may say we have gained and held for 2 years a recovery of 17 percent, and there is evidence of further improvement. The gain in retail business is considerably more than 14 percent; but taking business, industry, considerably more than 14 percent; but taking business, industry, and agriculture together we are safe in the statement that there has been a gain of not less than 17 percent since January 1933. Just how we shall stand after the New Year remains to be seen. But we must look beneath the surface of the situation if we would understand it. We ought to realize that no small part of the gains made in 2 years is due to the expenditure of vast sums of money borrowed by the United States Government and scattered throughout the country. The amount so borrowed and expended up to now is about $6,000,000,000, and provision has been made for borrowing if we can and expending from four been made for borrowing if we can, and expending from four to six billions more. Gains made upon borrowed money are not substantial, of course, and due regard must be had to this fact. They would be lost when the money gave out! And we would fall below even the March 1933, condition.

The first effect of the expenditure of borrowed money is bene-The first effect of the expenditure of borrowed money is bene-ficial; it is like the realization of the same amount of profits made in business, industry, or agriculture, but the later or actual effect is bad. If the reader should succeed in borrowing $10,000 to-morrow, payable in 90 days, he would present for a time the morrow, payable in 90 days, he would present for a time the appearance of a very prosperous citizen—the merchants, the bankers, and others would get the benefit of his expenditures. But at the end of 90 days all his prosperity would have vanished, and his last state would be far worse than it was before he borrowed his last state would be far worse than it was before he borrowed the money. He would have not only the $10,000 to pay back but also the interest, and all would depend on whether he had made really profitable use of the borrowed money.

It is the same way with money borrowed by the Government. The first effect is good, but the last effect is the handicap of debt. Things went well during the World War when we were borrowing and spending, but now we have been paying the bill—and it has just about bankrupted the whole world.

A BOTTOM TO UNCLE SAM'S BARREL

Our Government has been running behind now for 5 years. Our debt has increased from $16,026,086,000 (low post-war point) to about $28,000,000,000. We have not balanced our Budget because it seemed out of the question to raise the taxes to meet the cause it seemed out of the question to raise the taxes to meet the expenditures. We did not have the fortitude to balance the Budget—it predicated more than we could endure.

The pay day will come. The bottom of your Uncle Sam's barrel will be reached. In the meantime the more we borrow the harder it will be to pay the debt, the longer the depression will last. Moreover, the more we borrow the harder it will be to borrow. There is an end to Government credit. It is limited by the tax-paying power of the people—that is, by their earnings.

But no one is willing to stop now. Just as we felt that we had to borrow this money to prevent suffering, to provide employment, to preserve order and maintain government, so now, notwithstanding there is improvement, the conditions are such that the feeling is universal that we must go on with the program if we can.

is universal that we must go on with the program if we can. Senator Robinson comes from his interview with the President and speaks hopefully of "tapering off." But certain important and speaks hopefully of "tapering off." But certain important men in the Government say, "Not now; let us spend at least $8,000,000,000 more." It is only too plain that 6,000,000 workers are out of work, and that at least 17,000,000 of our fellow citizens are now dependent and will be dependent upon public relief for months to come. Only too plain that to stop now would paralyze retail business. We are a civilized Nation, and we cannot let men, women, and children starve. Besides, we know they would not starve. Nor may we hope to carry on well with 6,000,000 willing workers with nothing to do. They must have work. In a word, the demand for Government borrowing and spending has grown greater, rather than less.

It is likely, therefore, that the borrowing and expending of money by our Government will increase by several billions, and that this sort of stimulation of business, industry, and agriculture will go on for some months, perhaps for 2 years, if that be possible. But, remember, there is a definite end—there is an end to Uncle Sam's credit, there is a bottom to his barrel. And remember also the more the Government borrows, the less there will be to lend to individuals and corporations.

The crucial question of our time is this: Will we have the forti-

The crucial question of our time is this: will we have the fortitude to stop borrowing and spending before it is too late, or will we go on into national bankruptcy and ruin, when stop we must?

At this point I ask the reader to consider what would be the situation if we should reach this end, find ourselves unable to borrow, and, of necessity, stop all public expenditure while 6,000,000 men were out of work and 17,000,000 human beings were looking to a bankrupt and a helpless Government—looking in vain. The same thing would occur here that has always occurred under similar conditions. People do not consent to starve. They do not accept starvation. Here is the gravest reason for conserving the Government's credit.

FIRM BASES FOR PERMANENT RECOVERY

For this reason we must learn not to look for long to Government borrowing and expenditure as the means of quickening business. Conceding that conditions have justified the policy, we must also realize that in its nature it is temporary and if prolonged will defeat itself. The business man may profit by it for a time, but in the end it means his ruin. He ought not to depend a time, but in the end it means his ruin. He ought not to depend on it, for it must fail him.

At the present moment thoughtful men realize with deep concern that we have created a vested interest in Government borrowing and spending. That is, merchants are doing business on this money, railroads are running on this money, banks are operating on this money, factories are running on this money. No matter how we spend it or to whom we pay it, it is reflected in trade. Business men join with the jobless and the dependent and protest, "Do not stop now!" Let them be well assured we are not going to stop now. We dare not! But let them also realize that going to stop now. We dare not! But let them also realize that the day is not far distant when we will stop because we can borrow no more. They must find a time when they will stand up and say, "Stop now", or the hour will come when, whether they and say, "Stop now", or the hour will come when, whether they will or no, there will be an end—a terrible end. The credit of most of our States is manifestly running low—each and all are depending on the Federal Government. The credit of the United States can be exhausted. It is but little stronger than that of

The banks are now carrying $14,000,000,000 of United States Government paper. The Federal Government already owes nearly $28,000,000,000, and is committed to borrow $4,000,000,000 more. Can it safely go beyond $32,000,000,000 of debt? Its interest account now is nearly $1,000,000,000 a year. Add to this the indebt-edness of States eities and country. count now is nearly $1,000,000,000 a year. Add to this the indebt-edness of States, cities, and counties, not less than $18,000,000,000. Manifestly, we are near the danger line. The credit of the Gov-ernment is even now strained. Consider what would happen if its bonds and notes now in the banks should be offered in the open market in considerable quantities. There would be no buyers. It is fair to say that these notes and bonds are really frozen in the banks. They dare not throw them on the market.

We must all look, therefore, to other means of meeting our difficulties than the expenditure of money borrowed by the Government, and we must be looking now. We must be seeking all difficulties than the expenditure of money borrowed by the Government, and we must be looking now. We must be seeking all the ways and means of reducing expenditures consistent with carrying on. We must set the standard of expending only what we have to spend, and in the meantime look for the more substantial means of lasting recovery. We must foster agriculture, we must encourage industry, we must give business the fairest chance. For upon these we must depend for real recovery. Fortunately, we have no little reason to be hopeful that these more substantial means may be found and established. Fortunately, we may assert that some real part of the present improvement is due to other factors than borrowed Government money. Let us see what these are. what these are.

First of all, the American people have recovered from the hysteria of 1932-33 conditions. We have proved our capacity for order, for faith under conditions that would have overthrown any other nation, except England, perhaps. We have indeed come through deep waters with admirable spirit. We may not have again to go through them, but if we should, we will have a new faith in our capacity to take it—a new sense of our competence. Let this not be forgotten. It is the source of infinite strength, and we may need it. For nations as well as individuals must live by faith—faith in themselves and in God. We have sound reason for assuming that the American people are all right.

But we have more than this—we have a record of really substantial progress.

Millions of farmers have refinanced their farms, transferring their mortgages from hard-pressing creditors to patient Uncle

Millions of home owners have done likewise.

This has relieved not only the farmers and home owners but also their creditors. Their frozen mortgages were made liquid. The money went into circulation, but business was too feeble to

The general indebtedness of the people has been reduced by fully $30,000,000,000 by payment, compromise, or liquidation.

Wages paid labor are at least $50,000,000 more per week than in 1932.

The value of stocks and bonds has been doubled. The value of those listed on the New York Stock Exchange has risen from $35,000,000,000 to $70,000,000,000. This is a tremendous gain in the $35,000,000,000 to $70,000,000,000. This is a tremendous gain in the base of credit. For these stocks are widely held.

Deposits in banks have increased by more than $5,000,000,000, while borrowings have decreased. This means somebody has been making money, and profits indicate recovery.

The corporations reporting to the New York Stock Exchange show profits for the first 10 months of 1934 amounting to $345,-000,000—by far the best showing since 1929. Inventories have been reduced and durable goods are at any rate in the process of wearing out. The time element is doing its indispensable work.

THE FARMER'S SHARE OF INCOME

Best of all, our farmers have received for their 1934 crops more than \$6,500,000,000—one-third more than in 1932, and more than \$1,000,000,000 more than in 1933. This is due largely to the devaluation of the dollar, I will concede, but this does not seriously affect the value of the fact, since the dollar value did not drop so much at home. Cotton was selling for 7 cents a pound in gold in 1932. It is selling for about 8 cents a pound in gold today. But it is selling for  $12\frac{1}{2}$  cents in American currency. The difference lies is selling for 12½ cents in American currency. The difference lies largely in the fact that the gold value of the American dollar has been reduced from 25.8 grains to 15 5/21. The same thing is true of tobacco. The price of our tobacco in gold is only 18 cents a pound abroad, where settlements are made in gold. The price in American dollars is 30 cents, because they are no longer 25.8-grain gold dollars. As our dollar went down prices of our synthesis. gold dollars. As our dollar went down, prices of our exports sold in the world market went up.

There is another way to look at this matter of agricultural prices. A few years ago the farmer's share in the national income was only 6 percent. This fact alone was enough to have created depression. 6 percent. This fact alone was enough to have created depression. Now the farmer's share of the national income is 12 percent. Clearly, while others have been getting less our farmers have been getting more. But the farmers are entitled to more than 12 percent of the national income. They and their families constitute nearly one-fourth of the population. They are destined, in a balanced national economy, to get at least 20 percent of the national cash income; and whenever they shall the situation will be better for all. So this jump from 6 percent of the national income for our farmers to 12 percent is really one of the most significant evidences of recovery. That it was achieved by more income for our farmers to 12 percent is really one of the most significant evidences of recovery. That it was achieved by more than one device is well recognized, but that it was achieved with respect to cotton and tobacco—our export crops—by reason of the devaluation of our currency, is plain to anyone who will compare gold prices with the current devalued-dollar prices. This act of the administration has never been fully appreciated by the farmers, whom it benefited more than any others, almost exclusively. But should we return to the 25.8-grain gold dollar and cotton go to 7 cents and tobacco to 18 or 20 cents—as they surely would—there would be an understanding and an appreciation that would there would be an understanding and an appreciation that would leave nothing to be desired.

In addition to all these more substantial factors in our partial recovery, I may add that there is a decided measure of recovery in many nations—in England, in Canada, in Japan, in Australia. They appear to be securely on their way. It is often remarked that these nations did not invoke the extraordinary measures that was invoked. They did not horrow money for public expenditures. that these nations did not invoke the extraordinary measures that we invoked. They did not borrow money for public expenditures. They balanced their budgets and rode out the hurricane. There is an explanation. They went into the depression 10 years ahead of us. They have had 15 years of struggle. We have had 5. They took a long time to get out; we are trying to get out in a short time. Moreover, they did not owe as much money as our people did; they had no such speculative credit-inflation boom as we had. They did not have our high standard of living to maintain. They did not have so far to fall. And the taller they are the harder they fall, as Bob Fitzsimmons used to say.

It is fine that they are getting out ahead of us—that will help.

It is fine that they are getting out ahead of us-that will help It is fine that they are getting out ahead of us—that will help us. The world is interdependent. If Japan sells more silk, she will smoke more tobacco, buy more cotton. As England recovers she will buy more of us, and England is recovering as only England could. I wish Europe so well that I could hope she may do well enough to pay us something substantial on account of the war debt of $11,000,000.000. That would be a lift.

Altogether, between the artificial means of stimulation by borrowed public money and the evidences of substantial means of sound recovery, we have reason to be encouraged. There has been progress.

HOW TO PREVENT INFLATION

Our one danger now is some serious mistake, some national misstep that might bring on a fatal relapse. There is serious menace in the increasing demands for public expenditures, in the threat of exhausting the national credit and bringing on a ruinous inflation. There is grave danger in the vested interest in public spending. It is for this re son that we ought to seek the ways and means of gradually reducing expenditures and of balancing our Budget; that is, spending no more than we receive from taxes. We cannot sell bonds and notes forever.

All prudent men fear inflation; they know that it means ruin

All prudent men fear inflation; they know that it means ruin to all, wiping out bank deposits, insurance policies, all fixed investments and destroying the value of money itself. No government deliberately inflates its currency, just as no honest man deliberately passes bogus money. He knows he cannot do it long. Governments cannot manufacture money. They must collect it in taxes from the earnings of the people.

All told, taxes now amount to $10,000,000,000 a year; that is 20 percent of the national income. Every billion we borrow adds $40,000,000 to annual taxes. Many governments have been driven into inflation—or the attempt to manufacture money—by excessive expenditure and the exhaustion of their credit. Once the point of necessity is reached, there is no stopping. To prevent inflation, we must maintain our credit, we must make no debt which cannot be paid in taxes. We must balance our Budget. The longer we delay, the more difficult it will be to do this.

I fear that there will be not a few in the session of Congress who, with the best of intentions, will find borrowing and spending so popular—and they are more popular than economy—that they will advocate a course that can have but one consequence—not just the arresting of the healthful processes of recovery but national bankruptcy, national helplessness when human need is greatest, universal ruin, and other consequences of which I prefer not to speak.

greatest, universal ruin, and other consequences of which I prefer not to speak.

I have no respect for a public servant who will purchase public favor with public money. It is a corruption that works both ways and is as damnable as stealing. Demands upon Congress for billions are insistent and importunate. The temptation to purchase favor with borrowed public money is powerful. The vested interest in public spending is growing; businesses are too dependent upon it. Millions who demand this money do not realize what the consequences would be if their demands should be granted. They would get nothing—nothing but worthless paper. I appeal, therefore, to my readers to remember that the credit of our Government may be exhausted, that the value of its bonds may be brought low, wrecking the banks that hold them, and that national bank-ruptcy under existing conditions would be a disaster of unprecedented magnitude and indescribably terrible consequences.

As matters stand, stark necessity will compel us to borrow and spend every dollar we may dare to borrow and spend. Let us not ask for one dollar more than is demanded by grave necessity. Let us avoid any course that makes for inflation as we would a plague. It is a disease, a contagion, which no nation can endure, no statesman can cure. Once started, it runs irresistibly its course of national and personal ruin. The lessons of history, past and recent, bear out my statement.

We are not out of the woods. We can come through, but we cannot come through on borrowing and spending, helpful as these have been as cushions.

The progress other nations have made, the progress we have have been as cushions.

The progress other nations have made, the progress we have made, convince us we can come through—that there is a way. But that way is not easy. To rely upon public borrowing and spending for business stimulation is not that way. There must be courage, patience, a patriotic and sensible regard for one's country, capacity for sacrifices, self-reliant living, diligence in one's own business, fracelity, and saving.

for sacrinces, sen-reliant living, differed in one's own business, frugality, and saving.

How much we may rely upon ourselves, how little on the strained credit of our Government, must be the standard in every man's and woman's mind.

Our generation has, in a degree, as no other has had, the task of preserving the Republic of the United States.

THE TEXTILE INDUSTRY

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article on the textile industry by John W. Edelman, editor of the Hosiery Worker.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

As an epilogue to the great textile strike of 1934—but an epilogue played without an audience—the United States Department of Labor has issued findings which drive home the unalterable fact that by and large the textile industry is a social parasite.

The newspapers of this country with their usual gift for failing to emphasize and play up that which is significant and fundamental in our American sense, have completely fumbled their handling of the report by the United States Bureau of Labor Statistics on earnings in the cotton-textile industry which was undertaken under instructions of the President as a condition of calling off the strike of last year.

off the strike of last year.

This report which was issued on January 20, 1935, makes this startling statement: "Actually the average textile worker during the first year of the code never made more than $11.05 a week, or $875 a year."

the first year of the code never made more than $11.05 a week, or $575 a year."

At the time of the strike, August 1934, official curtailment—as distinct from the unofficial curtailment which had prevailed in the industry except for brief periods in some mills right along—had reduced the actual weekly earnings of the average textile worker to the astounding figure of $9.65. In those stark and elementary figures you have the entire explanation for the unprecedented and astounding walkout of almost three-quarters of a million workers in the textile mills of this country in August of 1934.

So that we shall not be guilty of the same sort of selection of data which results in the distortion of facts, which newspapers too frequently employ, permit me to give other pertinent and neglected conclusions of the United States Labor Department wage survey covering some 450,000 cotton-textile employees in approximately 1,200 mills. Two-thirds of the cotton textiles are now produced in the South and one-third in the North. We can give both the philanthropic southern mill owners and the generous northerners their due by quoting the following figures: Average weekly wages for all female textile employees in the South during August 1934 were $9.19 per week, while male employees in the South in the same month earned weekly wages of $10.29. In the North female cotton-textile employees drew weekly wages of $12.18 and male employees made $14.48 during the month of August 1934.

It is futile to go into the argument that textile workers could have earned more if there had been more employment.

It should be perfectly clear to all of us by this time that unless some very definite changes in the industry are brought about that cotton textiles cannot even insure its employees the wretchedly low minimum weekly consists. low minimum weekly earnings of $12 per week in the South and $13 in the North which the textile code calls for.

that cotton textiles cannot even insure its employees the wretchedy low minimum weekly earnings of $12 per week in the South and $13 in the North which the textile code calls for.

It is completely irrelevant to point out, as the Cotton Textile Institute does in an effort to cover up, that hourly wage rates in cotton textiles were raised more substantially than any other industry, except men's furnishings, as a result of the application of the code. In July 1933, the only industry which paid lower rates of wages than cotton textiles was cottonseed oil, cake, and meal manufacturing, which paid 19.3 cents per hour. Today average hourly rates in cotton textiles have climbed to the proud position of being fifth from the bottom in a list of 85 industries. Today cigars and cigarettes, canning and preserving, ertilizers, and the tasty and wholesome cottonseed oil, cake, and meal manufacturing are lower than cotton. Incidentally, cottonseed oil hourly wages have been swollen from 19.3 cents to 21 cents per hour.

The fact is that cotton textiles has always been a gigantic sweatshop industry and continues to be so today. What is true of cotton textiles is more or less true of the other major divisions of textile silk and wool. It may be predicted with entire assurance that what has been revealed in the cotton manufacturing branch of the industry by the United States Department of Labor survey will be duplicated with slight difference in degree as to conditions in the silk and woolen branches of the trade.

It is essential that the wavering and fickle attention of the public be kept on textiles as closely as possible because the combined and allied textle manufacturing industries employ a total of over one million and a quarter people. This is the largest number of people employed in any single type of manufacturing in America. For that reason alone governmental action to remedy conditions in textiles is not merely warranted but is essential and urgent.

The survey by the Federal Trade Commission into the earnings, the p the experience of consumer-goods industries generally during the depression that the value volume of consumption remained fairly stable despite price fluctuations.

Textiles is a basic industry, and its continued development is vital to the whole of our industrial civilization. It should be obvious that the public has more than a constitutional or legal interest in the conduct of the industry, the community has a definite and imperative responsibility for initiating such action as will establish and maintain what for the sake of brevity we will call "American conditions in the textile industry." The codes should have established the fact that the industry needs more leverage on its bootstraps than can possibly be provided by the same gentlemen who dragged the industry into the morass of permanent depress.on. Self-regulation under the direction of those who have created the impossible condition which should be regulated out of existence is, shall we say, a doubtful expedient.

It is out of the question in a 14-minute speech to give a blueprint for the reconstruction of the textile industry. There is, however, ample data on hand and talent available to undertake this necessary task. Manufacturers of basic textile fabrics should, if their public professions are to be taken at any face value, welcome a reorganization of their industry which would insure certain but modest returns on actual investments and which would also increase the market for textile products by improving purches in the stable products by improving purches in the stable come a reorganization of their industry which would insure certain but modest returns on actual investments and which would also increase the market for textile products by improving purchasing power for the vast population now dependent on the industry directly and indirectly for a livelihood.

The simple and effective legalistic framework which has been devised by legal experts for the regulation of the bituminous mining industry and introduced on January 21 in the Congress for the United Mine Workers of America by Senator Guffer, of Pennsylvania, as bill 1417, could no doubt be readily adapted to the needs of the textile industry.

A governmental cooperative selling corporation might be set up which would market all textiles at prices based on actual costs of production. It is notorious that for years textiles, due to peculiar selling conditions in the industry, were actually marketed below the real cost of manufacture. The Guffey bill provides that wages and working conditions in mining should be fixed in the first place by collective dealings between employers and employees.

When over half of the production in a given area of the industry agrees upon a scale, that scale should become uniform and shall be compulsory. Costs of production in textiles could be figured after fair rates of wages are established and plants and overhead costs are established by independent audit. Profits of the selling corporation could be properly used to retire the obsolescent or excess equipment which creates permanent instability in the industry, and would enable present unsuitable, insanitary, or inefficient plants to be modernized and made fit to work in.

The public would rapidly welcome the opportunity of purchasing textiles and textile products made according to specification ing textiles and textile products made according to specification and free from that frightful adulteration which a crazy and destructive competitive system has more or less forced on the industry. It should be to the benefit of the industry—and I include in the term "industry" those who work in it as well as those who own stocks or bonds—to remove the stigma of "cheap and nasty", which has been fairly widely fixed on the entire trade. Textile manufacturing, even under mass-production methods, could and should be restored to its rightful place as an industrial art. Today a piece of cloth is a symbol of sweated labor. Tomorrow that same cloth might be the product of competent workmen, capable technicians, and creative decorative artists. The enormous advances which have been made in applying art and science to the manufacture of textiles can only be realized in any adequate manner when the interest of the public is fully protected against the present parasitic methods prevailing in the protected against the present parasitic methods prevailing in the production of textiles.

THE SILVER QUESTION

THE MOSES OF SILVER

By Albert E. Hayes

It took Moses 40 years to lead the children of Israel through the wilderness and his only reward was a mountain vista of the promised land. It took Senator Norris, of Nebraska, about that long to abolish the "lame duck" Congress. But both stuck to their long to abolish the "lame duck" Congress. But both stuck to their tasks. Neither accepted a compromise. Senator Burton K. Wheeler, of Montana, is the Moses of bimetallists, and let us hope that in the end he will be permitted to enter the promised land. His Senate bill no. 70 for the legal remonetization of silver with free coinage at 16 to 1 with gold is before the Senate. It is clear, brief, and to the point, with no apologies. He says the act will relieve the farmers, livestock producers, and producers of raw materials generally. It will promote our foreign trade in all silver-using countries and prevent silver boarding and manipulation by terials generally. It will promote our foreign trade in all silver-using countries and prevent silver hoarding and manipulation by foreign manufacturers who have an advantage by cheap silver over the manufacturers of this country. It will stabilize metal money and give the masses of Asia a chance to elevate their standards of

The pros and cons of this issue have been threshed out to the point of exhaustion in three sessions of Congress and by so-called "economists" of all persuasions. Much fog thrown about the question has been dispelled since Uncle Sam took to purchasing domestically mined silver at 64.50 cents and foreign silver at the world market. It is now plain that the amount of silver available to the market is far short of what was predicted a year or two ago. China and India are the main reservoirs for foreign silver, and are proving that our silver Senators were right when they said it is China and India are the main reservoirs for foreign silver, and are proving that our silver Senators were right when they said it is contrary to human nature to dump good, hard money when its price is on the upward trend. Our money policy worries the statesmen and bankers of England, who are losing their ancient grip on oriental finance and commerce. France, the chief gold country, is gasping for breath and wondering how long she can stick to her single standard with her foreign trade rapidly slipping. To complete the financial leadership of America it is only necessary for Congress to legally establish gold at its present price and to legally restore silver money to the status it held for years after 1792, as is plainly set forth in Senator Wheeler's bill. The trouble now is that both are resting merely on an Executive order.

ADDRESS BY JAMES E. VAN ZANDT

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, lately the commander in chief of the Veterans of Foreign Wars, Mr. James E. Van Zandt, delivered a very interesting radio address on the occasion of the thirty-fifth anniversary of the founding of that organization. There have been various constructions of that address, some of which have led to unjust criticism of the commander. I am in receipt of a copy of his address, and I ask that it be printed in the Congressional Record in order that it may be seen exactly what the commander said and its relation to the relief legislation about to come forth to this body.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Friends of the radio audience: As national commander of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, I am deeply grateful to the National Broadcasting Co. for its cooperation in the presentation of this program which marks the thirty-fifth anniversary of the founding of our organization. I am also grateful to Maj. Gen. Smedley D. Butler, of the Marines, to Comrade James C.

Putnam, our first commander in chief, and to the members of the United States Marine Band for the manner in which they have participated in the success of this anniversary celebration.

From reports received at national headquarters, more than 3,000 local posts of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States are observing this anniversary tonight in their own communities. Through the facilities of the radio, at this moment, we are joined together in a birthday party that extends from coast to coast and from the borders of Canada to Mexico. In fact, this birthday party is an international occasion. Similar celebrations in recognition of this anniversary are being held tonight by the far-flung outposts of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States over in the Philippines; in Shanghai, China; in the Canal Zone; in Habana, Cuba; and by the members of Benjamin Franklin Post, No. 605, in Paris, France

Just as the science of radio brings us together under the same roof tonight, we—the members of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States—are joined together by the invisible tie of comradeship. It is this spirit of comradeship that has made possible the growing success of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the sible the growing success of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States. It is this spirit of comradeship that makes the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States the fastest growing veteran organization in the country today.

Although September 23 marked our thirty-fifth birthday as a veteran fraternity, the records show that as an organization we are younger, more vigorous, more aggressive, and more active than we have ever been in the past. We are working together with a definite objective in view and with a determination that these goals will be attained no matter what the cost.

As an organization we have every right to be proud of our past contributions to the welfare of the veteran, his dependents, and to the country at large. Those who have builded this organizato the country at large. Those who have builded this organiza-tion have displayed a rare devotion to the unselfish principles for which we are banded together. As an organization we are justly proud of the things that have already been accomplished in behalf of our disabled comrades. We have only to think of the security and comforts we have gained for the widows and orphans of many of our deceased comrades to feel more than well repaid for our labors.

In the affairs of veterans, however, we have learned that eternal vigilance is absolutely essential. As veterans we will never forget the problems of our disabled comrades. We will never forget the widows and orphans who have been left in our care. Unfortuwidows and orphans who have been left in our care. Unfortunately, new generations are prone to overlook the Nation's obligation to its disabled defenders and their dependents. We who are able-bodied must guard against this tendency in times of peace to ignore the plight of those whom we glorified in times of war. On Sunday, September 30, the delegates of more than 3,000 local posts of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States will meet in Louisville, Ky., for our thirty-fifth national encampment. The great majority of these delegates will abandon their personal duties and travel hundreds of miles at their own expense to discuss and deliberate over the many problems that confront the veteran cause.

The week of September 30 to October 5 in Louisville is not to be an occasion for hilarious celebration or unleashed appetites for pleasures. The men who gather at this conclave will be there for a serious purpose. They are deeply concerned not only with the problems that face the disabled and needy veteran but the Nation as a whole. Although they are looking forward to happy reunions with former comrades in arms, their mission will be one of serious intent. intent.

These men know that thousands of our comrades are still suffering from disabilities that are depriving them of an opportunity to help themselves. They know that thousands of widows and orphans of husbands and fathers who served honorably in the armed forces of the United States in times of war are today existing only through the grace of charity and kind-hearted neighbors. They recognize also that this country is standing on the threshold of a new era—threatened with the forces of various isms directly in contrast to the principles of the democracy they the threshold of a new era—threatened with the forces of various isms directly in contrast to the principles of the democracy they fought to save. They see the menace of many vicious theories sweeping the Nation. They see the threat of autocracy and the crushing hand of dictatorship throwing their shadows over this broad land of ours. And they know that the time is ripe for a mobilization of all citizens who are loyal to the Constitution of the United States and prefer its protection in preference to the new and untried experiments that others would thrust upon us. In conclusion, I send my greeting and felicitations to all members of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States and to the members of its auxiliary who have been so loyal and constant in their support and assistance. In this Nation-wide celebration we are not only giving recognition to a significant anniversary; we are rededicating ourselves, and our labors, to objectives that are untainted by selfishness or personal gain. In so doing, we are exemplifying the true spirit of Americanism and brotherhood among men.

among men.

To all overseas veterans of the War with Spain or the World War, we greet you as comrades. We invite you to extend your friendly cooperation in a cause that needs your support. We ask you to remember that your service to the Nation, and your loyalty to your comrades, did not end when you received your honorable discharge from the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps. These are obligations that each one of us must recognize and accept without reservation as a heritage that is ours as long as we take pride in the services we have been privileged to render as American citizens.

And the House agree to the same.

M. M. LOGAN, TOM CONNALLY, JAMES J. DAVIS, Managers on the part of the Senate. WILLIAM P. COLE, Jr., SAMUEL P. PETTENGILL, EDWARD A. KELLY, Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the conference report.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, before consent is granted I suggest to the Senator that he describe the changes which have been made by the conferees.

Mr. CONNALLY. I shall be glad to do so, with the consent of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. Logan].

The conference report makes very slight changes in the original text of the bill as it passed the Senate. The chief change was in this respect:

The House adopted a substitute for the Senate bill. In that substitute it qualified the absolute prohibition of the interstate shipment of oil, which the Senate bill contained, by tying on a proviso to the effect that whenever the President determines that supply and demand are out of balance he may lift the prohibition and open up the interstate shipment of oil. The conferees agreed to put the absolute prohibition in one section and put the qualifying phrase in another section; and in the qualifying phrase we put this clause:

If any provision of this section or the application thereof shall be held to be invalid, the validity or application of section 3 shall not be affected thereby.

The purpose of doing that was that the Senate conferees were fearful that if we should adopt the language of the House bill we should be just where we were before; that the Supreme Court would hold the whole measure unconstitutional because it was dependent upon the President's finding certain facts to exist. Other than that, the changes are insignificant, in the main merely declarative.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I desire to call the Senator's attention to the fact that the bill as it passed the Senate provided for permanent legislation.

Mr. CONNALLY. That is correct.

Mr. LOGAN. The House changed it so that it will expire in June 1936, and the conferees agreed to the date June 1937.

Mr. CONNALLY. I thank the Senator for that suggestion. As we passed the bill, Senators will remember, it was to be permanent legislation. The House modified it by making it terminate on the 15th of June 1936. The conferees agreed that it should terminate on June 15, 1937, extending it practically 2 years.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, am I to understand that there was incorporated in the conference report a provision that under certain circumstances the President might suspend the operation of the law?

Mr. CONNALLY. That is correct.

Mr. BORAH. And that is the provision to which the conference attached another provision-that in case the former should be held to be unconstitutional, it would not affect the rest of the bill?

Mr. CONNALLY. That is correct.

Mr. BORAH. I think that was a wise and an expedient provision.

Mr. CONNALLY. I thank the Senator.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Texas [Mr. Connally] that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the conference report.

Mr. CONNALLY. I move that the Senate agree to the conference report.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to:

WORK-RELIEF PROGRAM

The Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 117) making appropriations for relief

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, yesterday the Senator from Virginia [Mr. Glass], the Chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, stated to the Senate that in the event House Joint Resolution 117 should pass as the Senate subsequently amended it the joint resolution would encounter a veto.

There is a situation with which all Senators are familiar relating to funds for destitution relief. Manifestly, before any final resolution of the controversies could be reached under this measure, there would be a very distressing con-

The Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] feels that it is wise and desirable to recommit the joint resolution to the Committee on Appropriations. He has requested me to make a motion to that effect, and I now move that House Joint Resolution 117 be recommitted to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, no one can doubt the propriety of a motion of this character. I was informed when I entered the Chamber this morning that such probably would be the procedure. It is somewhat unusual, coming, as it does, from those who supported the joint resolution.

I should like to have the Senator from Arkansas, the able leader on the Democratic side of the Chamber, or the Chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, state what particular reasons they have in mind for this procedure, and what they expect to accomplish. I make this request so that we may vote intelligently, so that our action may be supported by some legitimate reasons.

I may add also that when this matter was before the Committee on Appropriations the Republican members of that committee attempted to bring in a bill immediately, without loss of time, to take care of destitution. If the Republicans should support the pending motion, I want it understood that when the joint resolution goes back prompt action will be taken by the committee in bringing out a bill to relieve distress.

What has held the measure up is the unusual and probably unconstitutional power sought to be conferred upon the President. That has led to an interminable debate, and we have to meet the present situation. I am sure that the Republican members of the committee will gladly cooperate with the Democratic members, who are responsible for the proposed legislation, in bringing back without delay a bill which will meet the true situation.

If a good reason is given for the return of the joint resolution to the committee, I am curious to know whether it is, in fact, the purpose to get rid of the McCarran amendment, which was placed in the joint resolution yesterday, or some other amendment which may be lying upon the desk of the clerk.

I think we should have an ample, fair, and frank expression from those who are responsible for the motion so that we may intelligently cast our votes.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, the Committee on Appropriations, in an extended consideration of the pending joint resolution, was pretty evenly divided on some of its most important provisions. For example, there was an even division on the proposition which the Senator from Oregon [Mr. Mc-NARY] just a moment ago mentioned, as to whether or not we should report a bill immediately providing for relief, and give more extended consideration to that portion of the measure which relates to public works; and on other questions there was almost a tie vote.

As stated by the distinguished Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], the joint resolution is in such a condition now as that it will, in my judgment, inevitably meet with a Presidential veto if it shall pass in its present form, and I think it extremely desirable that the joint resolution go back to the committee, in order that the committee may, as promptly as the circumstances will permit, go over its provisions again, and determine whether or not it may report to the Senate a bill which will not be quite so controversial.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, before the joint resolution shall be recommitted to the committee for the purpose. I assume, of bringing to the Senate promptly a bill for relief, I desire to call the Senate's attention to the evidence now in the record to the effect that out of this sum of $4,880,000,000 it was contemplated that $750,000,000 would go for relief and that $130,000,000 would go to the Civilian Conservation Corps.

In that connection, and in order that the members of the committee, if they will, may give it consideration, I desire to call their attention to an article appearing today in the Washington Post headed "10,000 posts in C. C. C. open to Democrats."

This was such startling news to me that I called the Washington Post to verify the article, and I was assured that I could rely upon it; and I desire to read certain portions of it. It begins by saying:

The Civilian Conservation Corps, to some extent at least, is

The Civilan Collectivation going political.

Speaker Byans created an uproar yesterday at a caucus of House Democrats on patronage when he announced at least 10,000 jobs as superintendents and foremen in charge of the camps would be distributed among deserving members of the party recommended

He indicated there would be an average of six jobs to each camp, paying from $110 to $200 a month. The Speaker promised Senators would have no say-so on such patronage.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order. The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. LONG. Is not that reflecting on the Senate, for the Senator to stand here and inform us that we are going to get none of this pie? [Laughter.]

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is not a point of order. That is a question for the Senator from Louisiana to decide for himself. [Laughter.]

Mr. HASTINGS. I read further from the article:

Representative McFarlane, of Texas, instigator of the patronage revolt, told the caucus President Roosevelt planned to appoint a personnel man in each department to receive complaints from House Members and assure them of courteous treatment.

"The President assured us", the Texan explained, "that he would cooperate with us in every way possible and consider our wishes. I think we're making progress."

I wish to say that I agree with him.

Mr. President, there has been much complaint here about the pending joint resolution, particularly by the distinguished Senator from South Carolina [Mr. Byrnes], because the Republicans had a conference about it. He went on to say that, so far as he could recall, it was the first time any conference had been held about an appropriation bill.

He asked us to take from the inaugural address of the President the evidence as to what should be done with this huge sum. But I inquire why the statement which I have just read from the Washington Post was not included in the President's inaugural address, or why some of the administration's witnesses appearing before the committee did not frankly state that this was a part of the program?

I think all of us have gotten the distinct impression that the money used for wages was to go to persons now on the relief roll, and that the average pay was to be $50 a month, but before the bill gets through the Senate we find the Speaker of the House announcing to the Democratic caucus that 10,000 deserving Democrats were to be taken care of out of the $130,000,000 to be appropriated for the C. C. C.

Will the explanation be made that this is not inconsistent with the President's statement, because the Speaker was talking about the money appropriated for the C. C. and 10,000 Republicans in the United States to take such jobs.

did not refer to the $4,000,000,000 for public works? Perhaps so; but I should like to inquire whether this is a satisfactory explanation to labor, which is asked to work on permanent Federal jobs at an average of $50 per month.

The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. Byrnes] has complimented the House upon the speed with which it passed this bill and has complained about the delay the bill has experienced in the Senate, but I am wondering if this promise or the possibility of the existence of 10,000 jobs to deserving Democrats had anything to do with the speed this bill experienced in the House.

Let us analyze this statement for a moment. We are assured that the salaries to be paid will be from $110 to $200 per month. This makes an average of $155 per month, or $1,860 per year. There are 322 Democratic Congressmen; and assuming all of them to be loyal and the distribution to be equal, this will permit each of them to place 31 persons in jobs, and the total annual salaries of the persons so placed by each Congressman will amount to $57,650. I think the average American has watched with some interest and with some pride the angels of relief administering to those in need, but I doubt whether he will take the same pride in finding $18,600,000 of public funds being administered annually to the relief of the "deserving" Democratic Members of the House.

These figures of 31 jobs for each Democratic Congressman are based upon the assumption that all of them will go along with the administration. If you eliminate the independent Congressmen who will not share in this distribution of jobs, you increase very greatly the number that goes to the loyal Congressman. But, perhaps, with this political patronage dangling before the eyes of the independent Democratic Congressman, it may have sufficient influence with him to partially, at least, eliminate that class from the Congress, so that it is not possible, therefore, to give an entirely accurate picture as to what the result will finally be.

Perhaps that same independence shown in this body has something to do with the statement that the Democratic Senators will have no say-so as to such patronage. They apparently are not to share in this huge birthday cake.

The political parties have struggled for years and have criticized each other about making political jobs for the postmasters of the country, but the total annual salaries of the postmasters is only something like $50,000,000, or $1,053 for each, but the Congress by a joint resolution of only a few lines has given an opportunity to make political patronage, amounting to a sum of nearly two-fifths of the total amount paid to postmasters.

If it be demonstrated so quickly, even before the bill passes, that they find 10,000 jobs out of an allocation of $130,000,000. how many jobs will they find for "deserving" Democrats out of the $4,000,000,000 named in this bill? Nobody on this side of the Chamber raised this question of partisanship with respect to this bill, but the very first speech made on the other side in favor of it, except, of course, that of the distinguished chairman, who merely explained the purposes of the bill, accused us on this side of making a political issue out of it.

I give these facts to show that the distinguished Senator from South Carolina evidently cried "wolf, wolf", so as to allay any suspicions on this side; but I respectfully suggest to the committee that when they are considering appropriating this sum for the benefit of those suffering from distress, those who are hungry and cold, they bear in mind the demand of the Democratic Congress that $18,600,000 of it shall first go to deserving Democrats, regardless of how much may be paid or how little may be paid to those in distress.

Mr. LONG obtained the floor.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. I merely wanted to ask the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS] if he thought he could find

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I just want to say about 30 or 40 words. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. Glass], in the Senate yesterday, pointed out the rank discrimination that has been practiced by some of the bureaucrats in Washington in reading the riot act to States, one to one and something else to another, and it appealed to me very much.

I am very glad to see this joint resolution go back to the committee under the Senator from Virginia [Mr. Glass], and I expect to appear before that committee in line with what the Senator from Virginia said, hoping that we will get a great deal of good out of putting something in this measure which will cure the condition he mentioned yesterday.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Arkansas to recommit the joint resolution to the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ROBINSON obtained the floor.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. ROBINSON. Not just at this juncture.

I do not desire to enter into a prolonged political debate with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. Hastings]. He has suddenly become the champion of nonpartisanship in the administration of governmental affairs. Every administration and every Senator and Representative have problems which present difficulties, problems pertaining to what is commonly called "patronage"; and it is a rather singular fact that when a Senator or Representative gets in the minority he immediately develops and demonstrates virtues which he was never before suspected of possessing. I doubt if there is anyone among us who is a more vigorous, not to say bitter, partisan than is the Senator from Delaware. I do not say that in criticism or denunciation, because there is sound reason underlying the proposition that those who administer measures and governmental affairs should be in sympathy with the principles and purposes of the head of the administration. You cannot justify, Mr. President, nor can the Senator from Delaware justify, retaining in most of the key positions in the departments and in the various other agencies which from time to time are created those who are allied with him in a partisan way while the Democratic administration is in control.

What the Senator from Delaware really would like to see happen is that under a Republican national administration all the offices be filled up by Republicans, and under a Democratic administration most of them, if possible, still be filled by Republicans.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield.

Mr. LONG. As our Senate leader-

Mr. ROBINSON. Oh, the Senator in naming me as our Senate leader does he monor overmuch. [Laughter.]

Mr. LONG. Unless I misunderstood the Senator from Delaware while reading the paper, the Speaker of the House was quoted as saying that in the dispensation of this fodder Senators would not be permitted to have any dip. That is where I take offense. I agree with the Senator that Democrats ought to get all the jobs; I agree with that.

Mr. ROBINSON. I am not so strong as is the Senator Irom Louisiana in believing that the Democrats ought to have all the jobs, but I do affirm and reaffirm that under a Democratic administration they ought to have fair recognition; they ought to have most of the jobs. [Laughter.]

The VICE PRESIDENT. The occupants of the galleries will refrain from any demonstration of approval or disapproval.

Mr. LONG. The point I am making is-

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator from Louisiana and I are more nearly in accord at this moment than we have been in a long time. [Laughter.]
Mr. LONG. The Senator overlooked my last point. I was

Mr. LONG. The Senator overlooked my last point. I was willing to concede, I meant to say, that the Democrats ought to have the jobs; I think that they ought to have at least most of the jobs, but what is my friend from Arkansas going to do for the remainder of his loyal followers in this body when

Mr. Byrns has announced that we are to be excommunicated in the award of this pie and none of us are going to be allowed to have anything; in other words, none of us are going to be allowed to come up to the pie counter? That is where I am kicking. I have never even been up there, but I at least want my friend from Montana to sit there for a while. [Laughter.]

Mr. ROBINSON. Well, Mr. President, there is, as I was attempting to say, a basis for fair action in the matter of patronage; and I unhesitatingly say that I think the present administration has kept in office in key positions too many Republicans too long. If I chose to go into details, I could name hundreds of old mossback Republicans [laughter], some of them not having heard a single movement on this mundane sphere within the last 15 years, literally thousands of them, placed in office by that great partisan associate of the Senator from Delaware, former Senator Smoot, of Utah.

If a Senator who has been out of this body for a long time could be reduced to a level of political recognition in key places in various departments with Democratic Senators who are serving here now, there would be ample recognition to gratify even the luxurious and constantly expanding ambition and desire of my friend the Senator from Louisiana. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, there is another thing that I am going to speak of in this connection while I am talking about it. There is an organized agitation, led by such nonpartisans as the Senator from Delaware, going on throughout the United States to the effect that you must not inject politics into this and that; that this and that are too good and too pure to have anyone who is associated with political affairs connected with it, and at the same time those who are carrying on the agitation, or, at least, those who are directing it, for the most part, themselves are the beneficiaries of long-lasting political influence, and many of them could not secure recognition, even in minor positions, if they had to rely solely on their merit. So, while the Senator from Delaware is criticizing the Speaker of the House for attempting to assist his valiant associates in that body, I ask him just to remember that whatever the Speaker may be able to do will not equal in the one-tenth degree what the Senator from Delaware did and what he was able to accomplish in a political way when he was not too holy to regard himself as a patronage dispenser.

I see that the Senator from Delaware is eager to resume the floor. [Laughter.] I am wondering now whether he is going to declare himself a champion of civil service. [Laughter.] I wish that some way could be found and applied to work out the selection of those who fill administrative Government positions without suggestion from such statesmen as the Senator from Delaware, and no doubt he feels the same desire with regard to myself.

In a time when a new administration comes into power there is a great deal of pressure exerted on Senators and Representatives from those who, having lifted aloft and borne with courage the banner of the party, feel that they are entitled to some consideration as against those who, entrenched under other administrations, resisted in every possible way the success of the reformers. I do not know of any method by which Senators may escape devoting a material and substantial part of their time, which is really required in connection with their official duties, in the attempt to reward their supporters and friends, their party associates by securing for them political offices. The representatives of the defeated party always cry, "Keep politics out of the Government", and the reason they do so is that it is the most effective way of retaining in office incompetent partisans associated with themselves.

Ah, it was not politics when my good friend the Senator from Delaware was naming postmasters in Delaware. That was patriotism. [Laughter.] It was not politics when my good friend the Senator from Delaware was suggesting to the then President the appointment of almost every officer to fill a vacancy in the State of Delaware. That was a natural tribute which any good President should pay to one so capable and so virtuous politically as is the Senator from Delaware. But when the tables are turned, when the opposition is in power, the Senator from Delaware joins the ranks of those who think it is a sin to recognize politics in governmental affairs. I am telling you that, whether you call it politics or not, that which you have in mind when you say politics" extends sometimes even into church organizations, even into school organizations, even into social organizations; and I have never yet found a practical way of dispensing with politics in governmental control. If the Senator from Delaware, in the chastened and purified state in which he is now living, has discovered and will reveal a plan by which we may escape the detrimental effects of unfair political influence, the whole country will welcome it; but, make no mistake, should the tables again be turned, he would be the same old spoilsman that he was in years gone by. [Laughter.] He would be reaching out and looking up and, mayhap, striking forward aggressively in an effort to obtain his share of

I believe that underlying this discussion is a serious principle. I do not believe that anybody should be appointed to office merely because of his politics. I do not believe anyone should be placed in a position who is incapable of performing the duties of that position fairly and efficiently. But I must now and ever repudiate the implied theory of the Senator from Delaware-namely, that only Republicans possess high standards of qualification to perform public service.

Everyone here knows my friendship for those who sit on the other side of this Chamber. Through all the years of my feeble efforts to serve here I have enjoyed their confidence and support. I have a feeling of positive affection for most of the Senators who have labored during the period of my efforts here.

There is only one consideration which I hesitate in extending to a Republican. I do not believe he is especially fitted for office. I cannot join with my friend, the Senator from Delaware, in the theory that Democrats are so lacking in intelligence or in patriotism that in a Democratic administration Republicans are entitled to occupy key positions and determine the effectiveness of the very measures which are advanced by the administration.

I believe, too, that there has been less politics displayed under this administration in the appointment of officers than under any other administration during the memory of my friend, the Senator from Delaware, or my own much longer memory. I do not believe there has been any injustice done; I do not believe the Senator from Delaware has any valid ground of complaint; but if he really is devoted to the cause of efficiency, if he is anxious to make it certain that no Republican in Delaware who is incompetent and inefficient should be retained in office or in the event of a change in the control of the Government be appointed to office, my theory is that the Senator would find himself standing in lonely isolation facing a restless and ever-rolling political sea.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, I am a little surprised that the mere statement I read from a Washington newspaper should have brought forth such a labored effort upon the part of the distinguished Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]. I did one thing evidently which I had not even hoped to do. I tore off the cloak of deception which has been worn by the Democratic Party ever since they began the relief business. We have charged not once but many times that the Democratic Party was using for political purposes the funds which we appropriated for relief. The Senator from Arkansas took a long time to affirm that charge which we have frequently made. He talked about jobs ranging from $110 to $200 a month, and he said they are jobs the Democrats ought to have and that those jobs are to go to deserving Democrats.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Delaware yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. HASTINGS. Yes. Mr. ROBINSON. I was talking about jobs generally. Mr. HASTINGS. I said nothing about jobs generally.

Mr. ROBINSON. I was making no reference to any particular class of jobs, and I never intimated that we were using appropriations for political purposes. My point was that in the Democratic administration, under the claim of avoiding politics, Senators like the Senator from Delaware ought not to be permitted and enabled to control such appointments as it might be necessary to make.

Mr. HASTINGS. It was not necessary to make that point in answer to anything I had said. I complained because in this relief measure we were asked to appropriate $130,000,000 to carry on the army of the C. C. C., which is three times as large as the Regular Army. The only point I made about it was that there were 10,000 jobs, ranging from $110 a month to $200 a month, which were to be given only to deserving Democrats.

I say, if the Democratic principle is applied, if the principle is applied that only deserving Democrats shall get that kind of jobs, then may I inquire whether the rate of wages has been kept down under this measure so that nobody particularly would be interested in the $50 per month jobs except in order to obtain food? I ask why not provide that there shall be taken from the relief roll the 10,000 men who are necessary to handle these jobs? The Senator will find plenty of them on the relief rolls. He will find plenty of them out of employment, both Democrats and Republicans.

But, no; the Speaker of the House says this is to be confined to deserving Democrats. If we apply this political principle, this patronage principle, to anything in the relief matter, then I say it comes clear down to the very fellow who is getting bread at the hands of the Federal Government in order that he may feed himself. If it is proposed to practice it at all in that way, eventually it will be practiced down to the very lowest level. That is my complaint.

I am not complaining about the Democratic Party ignoring all they have said during the last 30 or 40 years about civil service. I have passed that up long ago and given up any idea of doing anything about it. With their great majority they have ignored it and placed in every bill a provision that the civil service shall be ignored. I have given up any fight about that, but I do insist that it is part of my duty and part of the duty of every conscientious man in the Senate to go as far as he can to prevent the President of the United States, or anybody under him, using the relief money intended to feed and clothe the people, in order that deserving Democrats may have jobs.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. I desire to make just one statement to the Senator.

Mr. HASTINGS. If the Senator desires to make a statement, I suggest that he make it in his own time. I am

Mr. WHEELER. Did the Senator mean to intimate that the relief which has been handled has been handled by Democrats throughout the country? Is that the point the Senator is trying to make—that it has been handled in that way?

Mr. HASTINGS. Oh, no!

Mr. WHEELER. Let me say to the Senator that during the Hoover administration, when relief organizations were set up in my State and practically every other State in the Northwest, they were composed almost entirely, in every county and in every city, of Republicans. Not only that, but the same organization in my State that handled the relief funds during the Hoover administration is still handling them, and the work is in the hands of Republicans in every city and in every county in the State of Montana.

Mr. HASTINGS. No, Mr. President; what I was talking about in particular was the giving of a million dollars for relief to Maine, for instance, and distributing it all over that State just a few weeks before election. That is what I mean when I talk about your using relief money for political purposes; and it is true not only of Maine but of other States in the Union. We have charged time and time again that citizens have had so much relief that they felt it necessary to vote for Democrats in order that they might get more.

Mr. WHEELER. I will say to the Senator that, if that were done in Maine or in any other State for political purposes, it was a despicable thing to do, and I have no brief for anybody who would attempt to resort to that sort of thing. I do say, however, that in my State and throughout the Northwest, so far as I know, in Minnesota and North Dakota and South Dakota and practically all the States with which I am familiar, relief was distributed through the Republican organizations that had been set up during the Hoover administration, and they were all Republican organizations. Any Senator from any one of those States, I am sure, will confirm what I am saying.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I desire to say with reference to Tennessee that exactly the same conditions prevailed there. The relief administration appointed under President Hoover was substantially carried on under the present administration. I desire to say further that that relief administration was almost solidly for the opponent of the nominee for the Senate on the regular Democratic ticket, namely, the Republican candidate who ran against me; and, also, for the Fusion candidate who ran against the Democratic candidate for Governor in my State. In other words, if there was any politics about it—and there was politics about it—the politics was used in behalf of the Republican nominee in my State and against the regular Democratic nominee.

Mr. WHEELER. As a matter of fact, in my home city of Butte men came to me and said that they did not dare be seen coming to my office, because if they were seen they might be cut off the relief rolls. That has been going on in many other places. I am told that the relief in the State of Indiana was dominated and controlled by the United States Steel Corporation. The relief in other places has been controlled by the big interests of this country, where it was placed during the Hoover administration.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I just want to say that that does not apply only to the Northern States. Down in my State of Louisiana a patronage committee of 3 was appointed and 2 of them were Republicans; 2 of them voted for Hoover.

What I did not hear discussed, however, and what I am objecting to, is that nobody seems to have noticed that it has been announced that none of these jobs shall go to Senators. [Laughter.] I want the integrity of the Senate defended and respected; that is all. I think we are failing to consider ourselves. What is going to happen to us, Mr. President? [Laughter.]

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I am not interested in what is going to happen to us. Let me say to the Senator that I have not any desire for any of this relief patronage. I wish it were all taken away. It is only a burden and a detriment to the man who has it. So far as I am concerned, I am not interested in it; but so far as the States with which I am familiar are concerned, and I am told the same thing is true in other States, when Republicans complain because of the way in which relief was handled, it was handled in those States to a large extent by the big interests of the States, and it was handled by the Republican organization, and it is handled by the Republican organization, and it is handled by the Republican organization in many of those States today.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I am totally unconcerned about all this discussion regarding partisan politics. I am almost tempted to say that I am unconcerned because there are not enough Republicans in Virginia to give me any concern as to the distribution of patronage; but what I am concerned about is the effort to make it appear that there has been one particle of partisan politics in the consideration of the joint resolution which we have just recommitted to the Committee on Appropriations.

I have always had some degree of respect for the intellectual capabilities of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. Hastings], but I discover now that he has not sense enough or discernment enough to understand that if he undertakes to make politics of this situation he is simply submerged in the beginning. Neither in the Senate nor in the House nor in the Senate Committee on Appropriations has there been one word of partisan politics uttered on the subject of this appropriation; and upon divisions in the Senate committee as to the various problems arising in connection with the joint resolution there was at all times a nonpartisan division in the vote. I am not only astonished but I deplore the fact that the Senator from Delaware has perverted what I really thought was his intellectual capability by introducing this subject in such a vicious way.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I shall occupy only a moment. This joint resolution has now gone back to the committee. There is a possibility—I suppose a probability—that it will come back to the Senate more in the nature of a relief measure than a public-works measure. I desire to suggest to the committee that in considering it in the nature of a relief measure it should provide very specifically a method for the distribution of this fund, a method which will fix responsibility.

I made an investigation last fall, and I have at hand the material resulting from that investigation, whenever it is necessary to discuss it. The investigation disclosed very clearly that there was a vast amount of politics in the distribution of the relief fund, and that as a result there was a vast amount of waste in its distribution.

I will say that I did not discover that there was any politics upon the part of the Administrator himself, Mr. Hopkins; but the method which was adopted in the distribution of the fund—namely, turning over to the States a large amount of the fund for distribution—while Mr. Hopkins claimed that he was in no sense responsible after it left him, resulted in the exercise of politics and political favoritism and a vast amount of waste.

I think I can demonstrate to the Senate that not only thousands and hundreds of thousands but millions of dollars were wasted, and they were wasted because there was no method or means by which to check against the people who were distributing the fund in the different districts and in the different States.

For instance, I have a report from the attorney general of a certain State. He is not a partisan in the sense that he would be biased, because he is a Democrat, but he called attention to the vast amount of waste that was going on in his State. In reply he was told that the officials here at Washington were not responsible; that the money had been furnished, and when it was furnished the responsibility of Washington ended.

The joint resolution should provide that the authorities in Washington should be responsible for every dollar that is expended, and they should be responsible for those who expend it. Those who expend it in the first place should be required to make reports directly to the authorities in Washington, and the authorities in Washington, in the final analysis, should be responsible for the expenditure. Otherwise we shall have a repetition of the vast waste which I say has already taken place.

I repeat, I am not charging partisanship to Mr. Hopkins, but I am charging a looseness of method in the distribution which enabled local individuals to exercise it in the interest of party, and they did that very thing.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for just a moment?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. So long as the States are putting up a substantial amount of money—and some of them are putting up a substantial amount of money for relief in conjunction with the Federal Government—it seems to me we should consider that the State has some right to cooperate in the administration of those funds. I think perhaps the Senator's proposition might be more applicable if the entire sum were being put up by the Federal Government, as it is in a great many States, or nearly all of it. In many cases, however, the States themselves are raising money through taxation, the counties and the municipalities are raising money, and it seems to me that in that situation we must have cooperation between the Federal Relief Administration and that of the State in the expenditure of their joint fund.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, as a matter of fact, the States are putting it all up in the last analysis. Where else does the Federal Government get any money?

Mr. BORAH. Of course, that is true in a sense. Nevertheless, it is appropriated out of the Federal Treasury. It is put into the hands of a Federal administrator. The Federal administrator sends it to certain officers in the States. and when he sends it there he claims that his responsibility ends. I claim that it does not end or should not end there.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. In just a moment.

So far as the suggestion of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. La Follette] is concerned, I readily admit that, if State authorities are administering State funds, they should be held responsible for them and they accept responsibility for administering State funds; but where they are administering Federal funds-and that is the case now in a very large majority of all of the States-I say that the responsibility ought to attach right here at Washington, and never end, so that somebody may be responsible for the money.

I have a copy of a telegram from an investigator in one of the States which says in substance, "A million dollars has disappeared and we cannot find it." [Laughter.] It had disappeared through the activities of State agencies, and they were apparently responsible to nobody. I say that the responsibility should attach right here for every dollar that goes out of the Federal Treasury.

Mr. GLASS. Who here is responsible to anybody? Mr. BORAH. I am responsible to the Senator from Virginia in the sense that I want to state the facts so that he may know them when he comes to deal with the matter before his committee.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BORAH. I yield. Mr. LONG. What I want to find out is this: What is going to be done with the rank discrimination in apportioning these funds? There should be one rule for one State and the same rule for another State. Why do they say to Louisiana to put up so much, to Mississippi to put up nothing, to Arkansas to put up nothing, and to Mississippi, which puts up nothing, "You name your administrator"; to Arkansas, which puts up practically nothing, "You name your administrator"; but they come down to Louisiana and sandbag Louisiana into putting up $600,000, and say, "We will not allow you to name the administrator, we have to name somebody else"; and in that particular case they name somebody whom they bring from outside of the State, which action is pleasing to a local Republican organization down there?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, that seems to be a family affair. [Laughter.]

Mr. LONG. It is not much of a family matter if you are the child that is being made to put up and the other one is not made to put up anything. Is it against the law, is it against conscience, for the Senator from Virginia to write something into this bill to stop this kind of rank discrimination?

We should have some kind of a rule here. This man up here says to the Connecticut Legislature, and to another legislature, "You meet. You pass this law, otherwise I cut off your relief." One little man here who has not been elected to anything and never will be elected to anything, perhaps, calls on one State legislature, "You meet and do this and do the other"; and the State legislature right next to it they do not call into session; and they do not meet; they do not do anything; but he sends them perhaps double the amount of relief money and puts it in their hands. That is the kind of thing that is going on, and we do nothing to correct it.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I desire to draw to the Senate's attention this fact: My understanding is that our purpose now is to get rid of the system under which we have been operating direct relief, and to substitute for it what is called "work relief." If we are determining now to do away with the dole system of relief, which we have been heretofore practicing, furnishing food and supplies and that sort of thing, and to substitute for it work relief, it seems to me we need not be bothered so much about the other plan.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I had that in mind, and for that reason I have not discussed the subject heretofore. If the whole plan was to be changed, I see nothing to be gained by discussing waste under the old system. But let me say that, in my opinion, it will be pertinent when the measure gets back to the Senate.

Mr. FLETCHER. My idea is that we are undertaking now to give relief to people by providing work for them, and paying them something on which to live. My conception is that this work plan means the advancement and advantage of the public generally. It means that we are to have some increase of national wealth. It means that we are to do real work, and the projects which the President will undertake under this plan will be such as to be practically self-liquidating. In other words, the money will come back to the country, will come back to the people directly or indirectly in that we will increase public advantage, convenience, facilities, and benefits. That is the plan. It involves doing away with the system of direct relief, the practice of which the Senator has been men-

We want to put three million and a half men to work on public enterprises, on enterprises which will be, to some extent at least, self-liquidating, on enterprises which will add to the wealth of the Nation, on enterprises which will help the whole country, not any particular section, but the whole country. That is the purpose, and I cannot understand why there should be any opposition to such a plan.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, does not the Senator believe that if we should send word out to the country that we are going to lighten taxes, that we are not going to increase the burden by four or five million dollars-and I am not speak-. ing of the $880,000,000 for relief—that men would be willing to invest more in private enterprises, and that within a year more men would be employed than as a result of taxing the people of the United States four or five billion dollars for alleged public works?

CROP PRODUCTION AND HARVESTING LOANS

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, the bill for farm relief recently passed has been signed by the President, but in signing the bill he made the recommendation that the appropriation authorized in the measure should come out of the funds which would have been appropriated under the work relief bill which has just been recommitted.

If relief is to be had as contemplated under the so-called "seed-loan legislation", other provision must be made from appropriations so that the work may begin. We are practically at the 1st of March, and from every State in the Union there have come requests for assistance.

I have today introduced a joint resolution, being Senate Joint Resolution 67, covering this point, and I hope that on Monday when the Senate reconvenes we may dispose of that measure, so that the necessary funds may become available to the distressed farmers.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, has the joint resolution introduced by the Senator been referred to the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. SMITH. It has been so referred.

EMERGENCY RELIEF

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, on December 4, 1934, the Federal Emergency Relief Administration issued a statement showing the sources of public emergency-relief funds, by quarters, for 1933 and 1934.

This report, which will be found very illuminating, shows the distribution of the fund about which there has been some discussion this afternoon. I am not charging that any politics was involved in the distribution of the fund. I do contributions in excess of 99 percent from the Federal not believe the report has been put into the RECORD or Government. printed and, if it has not been, I ask consent now that it may be printed in the RECORD, and printed as a public docu-

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 22, 1935

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

God be merciful unto us and bless us and cause His face to shine upon us, that Thy way may be known upon earth. Heavenly Father, we most humbly and gratefully acknowledge Thy providence. Amid the tumult and passion of war, staggering and benumbing the ideals of our forefathers, Thou gavest us one to inspire and light the torch of a new civilization. In the sweeping deserts of accusation and criticism, suspicion and selfishness, his moral earnestness held aloft the aspirations of a burdened people. By his chivalry of soul and undaunted spirit he reclaimed human rights, restored organized government, and became the morning star of the new world. Eternal God, may this day be one of rededication at the altar of our Republic. Crown our entire citizenship with the capacity to sacrifice and suffer for our country, which they love to call their home. We pray that this Congress may add flower to flower, fruit to fruit in our national garden until it is borne to the realm of peace and prosperity. In the name of our Savior. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

WASHINGTON'S FAREWELL ADDRESS

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Driscoll] to read the Farewell Address of Washington.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Mr. Speaker, Washington's Farewell Address to the people of the United States in September 1796 is in the following words:

To the people of the United States.

FRIENDS AND FELLOW CITIZENS: The period for a new election of a citizen to administer the executive government of the United States being not far distant, and the time actually arrived when your thoughts must be employed in designating the person who is to be cloathed with that important trust, it appears to me proper, especially as it may conduce to a more distinct expression of the public voice, that I should now apprise you of the resolution I have formed, to decline being considered among the number of those, out of whom a choice is to be made.

I beg you, at the same time, to do me the justice to be assured, that this resolution has not been taken, without a strict regard to all the considerations appertaining to the relation which binds a dutiful citizen to his country; and that, in withdrawing the tender of service which silence in my situation might imply, I am influenced by no diminution of zeal for your future interest; no deficiency of grateful respect for your past kindness; but am supported by a full conviction that the step is compatible with both.

The acceptance of, and continuance hitherto in the office to which your suffrages have twice called me, have been a uniform sacrifice of inclination to the opinion of duty, and to a deference for what appeared to be your desire. I constantly hoped that it would have been much earlier in my power, consistently with motives which I was not at liberty to disregard, to return to that retirement from which I had been reluctantly drawn. The strength of my inclination to do this, previous to the last election, had even led to the preparation of an address to declare it to you; but mature reflection on the then perplexed and critical posture of our affairs with foreign nations, and the unanimous advice of persons entitled to my confidence, impelled me to abandon the idea.

I rejoice that the state of your concerns external as well as internal, no longer renders the pursuit of inclination incompatible with the sentiment of duty or propriety; and am persuaded, whatever partiality may be retained for my services, that in the present circumstances of our country, you will not disapprove my determination to retire.

The impressions with which I first undertook the arduous trust, were explained on the proper occasion. In the discharge of this trust, I will only say that I have, with good intentions, contributed towards the organization and administration of the government, the best exertions of which a very fallible judgment was capable. Not unconscious in the outset, of the inferiority of my qualifications, experience, in my own eyes, perhaps still more in the eyes of others, has strengthened the motives to diffidence of myself; and, every day, the increasing weight of years admonishes me more and more, that the shade of retirement is as necessary to me as it will be welcome. Satisfied that if any circumstances have given peculiar value to my services they were temporary, I have the consolation to believe that, while choice and prudence invite me to quit the political scene, patriotism does not forbid it.

In looking forward to the moment, which is to terminate the career of my political life, my feelings do not permit me to suspend the deep acknowledgment of that debt of gratitude which I owe to my beloved country, for the many honors it has conferred upon me; still more for the steadfast confidence with which it has supported me; and for the opportunities I have thence enjoyed of manifesting my inviolable attachment, by services faithful and persevering, though in usefulness unequal to my zeal. If benefits have resulted to our country from these services, let it always be remembered to your praise, and as an instructive example in our annals, that under circumstances in which the passions, agitated in every direction, were liable to mislead amidst appearances sometimes dubious, vicissitudes of fortune often discouraging-in situations in which not unfrequently, want of success has countenanced the spirit of criticism,—the constancy of your support was the essential prop of the efforts, and a guarantee of the plans, by which they were effected. Profoundly penetrated with this idea, I shall carry it with me to my grave, as a strong incitement to unceasing vows that Heaven may continue to you the choicest tokens of its beneficence—that your union and brotherly affection may be perpetual—that the free constitution, which is the work of your hands, may be sacredly maintained—that its administration in every department may be stamped with wisdom and virtue-that, in fine, the happiness of the people of these States, under the auspices of liberty, may be made complete, by so careful a preservation, and so prudent a use of this blessing, as will acquire to them the glory of recommending it to the applause, the affection and adoption of every nation which is yet a stranger to it.

Here, perhaps, I ought to stop. But a solicitude for your welfare, which cannot end, but with my life, and the apprehension of danger, natural to that solicitude, urge me, on an occasion like the present, to offer to your solemn contemplation, and to recommend to your frequent review, some sentiment; which are the result of much reflection, of no inconsiderable observation, and which appear to me all-important to the permanency of your felicity as a People. These will be offered to you with the more freedom, as you can only see in them the disinterested warnings of a parting friend, who can possibly have no personal motive to bias his counsel. Nor can I forget, as an encouragement to it, your indulgent reception of my sentiments on a former and not dissimilar occasion.

Interwoven as is the love of liberty with every ligament of your hearts, no recommendation of mine is necessary to fortify or confirm the attachment.

The unity of Government which constitutes you one people. is also now dear to you. It is justly so; for it is a main pillar in the edifice of your real independence; the support of your tranquility at home: your peace abroad; of your safety; of your prosperity; of that very liberty which you so highly prize. But, as it is easy to foresee, that from different causes and from different quarters, much pains will be taken, many artifices employed, to weaken in your minds the conviction alliances, attachments, and intrigues would stimulate and of this truth; as this is the point in your political fortress against which the batteries of internal and external enemies will be most constantly and actively (though often covertly and insidiously) directed; it is of infinite moment, that you should properly estimate the immense value of your national union to your collective and individual happiness; that you should cherish a cordial, habitual, and immovable attachment to it; accustoming yourselves to think and speak of it as of the palladium of your political safety and prosperity; watching for its preservation with jealous anxiety; discountenancing whatever may suggest even a suspicion that it can in any event be abandoned; and indignantly frowning upon the first dawning of every attempt to alienate any portion of our country from the rest, or to enfeeble the sacred ties which now link together the various parts.

For this you have every inducement of sympathy and interest. Citizens by birth or choice, of a common country, that country has a right to concentrate your affections. The name of American, which belongs to you, in your national capacity, must always exalt the just pride of patriotism, more than any appellation derived from local discriminations. With slight shades of difference, you have the same religion, manners, habits, and political principles. You have in a common cause fought and triumphed together; the independence and liberty you possess, are the work of joint councils, and joint efforts, of common dangers, sufferings and successes.

But these considerations, however powerfully they address themselves to your sensibility, are greatly outweighed by those which apply more immediately to your interest.-Here every portion of our country finds the most commanding motives for carefully guarding and preserving the union of the whole.

The north, in an unrestrained intercourse with the south, protected by the equal laws of a common government, finds in the productions of the latter, great additional resources of maritime and commercial enterprise and precious materials of manufacturing industry.—The south in the same intercourse, benefiting by the same agency of the north, sees its agriculture grow and its commerce expand. Turning partly into its own channels the seamen of the north, it finds its particular navigation invigorated; and while it contributes, in different ways, to nourish and increase the general mass of the national navigation, it looks forward to the protection of a maritime strength, to which itself is unequally adapted. The east, in a like intercourse with the west, already finds, and in the progressive improvement of interior communications by land and water, will more and more find a valuable vent for the commodities which it brings from abroad, or manufactures at home. The west derives from the east supplies requisite to its growth and comfort-and what is perhaps of still greater consequence, it must of necessity owe the secure enjoyment of indispensable outlets for its own productions, to the weight, influence, and the future maritime strength of the Atlantic side of the Union, directed by an indissoluble community of interest as one nation. Any other tenure by which the west can hold this essential advantage, whether derived from its own separate strength; or from an apostate and unnatural connection with any foreign power, must be intrinsically precarious.

While then every part of our country thus feels an immediate and particular interest in union, all the parts combined cannot fail to find in the united mass of means and efforts, greater strength, greater resource, proportionably greater security from external danger, a less frequent interruption of their peace by foreign nations; and, what is of inestimable value, they must derive from union an exemption from those broils and wars between themselves, which so frequently afflict neighbouring countries, not tied together by the same government; which their own rivalship alone would be sufficient to produce, but which opposite foreign embitter.—Hence likewise, they will avoid the necessity of those overgrown military establishments, which under any form of government are inauspicious to liberty, and which are to be regarded as particularly hostile to republican liberty; in this sense it is, that your union ought to be considered as a main prop of your liberty, and that the love of the one ought to endear to you the preservation of the other.

These considerations speak a persuasive language to every reflecting and virtuous mind, and exhibit the continuance of the Union as a primary object of patriotic desire. Is there a doubt whether a common government can embrace so large a sphere? let experience solve it. To listen to mere speculation in such a case were criminal. We are authorized to hope that a proper organization of the whole, with the auxiliary agency of governments for the respective subdivisions, will afford a happy issue to the experiment. It is well worth a fair and full experiment. With such powerful and obvious motives to union, affecting all parts of our country, while experience shall not have demonstrated its impracticability, there will always be reason to distrust the patriotism of those who, in any quarter, may endeavor to weaken its bands.

In contemplating the causes which may disturb our Union, it occurs as matter of serious concern, that any ground should have been furnished for characterising parties by geographical discriminations,-northern and southern-Atlantic and western; whence designing men may endeavor to excite a belief that there is a real difference of local interests and views. One of the expedients of party to acquire influence within particular districts, is to misrepresent the opinions and aims of other districts. You cannot shield yourselves too much against the jealousies and heart burnings which spring from these misrepresentations: they tend to render alien to each other those who ought to be bound together by fraternal affection. The inhabitants of our western country have lately had a useful lesson on this head: they have seen, in the negotiation by the executive, and in the unanimous ratification by the senate of the treaty with Spain, and in the universal satisfaction at the event throughout the United States, a decisive proof how unfounded were the suspicions propagated among them of a policy in the general government and in the Atlantic states. unfriendly to their interests in regard to the Mississippi. They have been witnesses to the formation of two treaties, that with Great Britain and that with Spain, which secure to them everything they could desire, in respect to our foreign relations, toward confirming their prosperity. Will it not be their wisdom to rely for the preservation of these advantages on the union by which they were procured? will they not henceforth be deaf to those advisers, if such they are, who would sever them from their brethren and connect them with aliens?

To the efficacy and permanency of your Union, a government for the whole is indispensable. No alliances, however strict, between the parts can be an adequate substitute; they must inevitably experience the infractions and interruptions which all alliances, in all times, have experienced. Sensible of this momentous truth, you have improved upon your first essay, by the adoption of a constitution of government, better calculated than your former, for an intimate union, and for the efficacious management of your common concerns. This government, the offspring of our own choice, uninfluenced and unawed, adopted upon full investigation and mature deliberation, completely free in its principles, in the distribution of its powers, uniting security with energy, and containing within itself a provision for its own amendment, has a just claim to your confidence and your support. Respect for its authority, compliance with its laws, acquiescence in its measures, are duties enjoined by the fundamental maxims of true liberty. The basis of our political systems is the right of the people to make and to alter their constitutions of government.-But the constitution which at any time exists, untill changed by an explicit and authentic act of the whole people, is sacredly obligatory upon all. The very idea of the power, and the right of the people to establish government presuppose the duty of every individual to obey the established government.

All obstructions to the execution of the laws, all combinations and associations under whatever plausible character, with the real design to direct, control, counteract, or awe the regular deliberations and action of the constituted authorities, are destructive of this fundamental principle, and of fatal tendency.—They serve to organize faction, to give it an artificial and extraordinary force, to put in the place of the delegated will of the nation the will of party, often a small but artful and enterprising minority of the community; and, according to the alternate triumphs of different parties, to make the public administration the mirror of the ill concerted and incongruous projects of faction, rather than the organ of consistent and wholesome plans digested by common councils, and modified by mutual interests.

However combinations or associations of the above description may now and then answer popular ends, they are likely, in the course of time and things, to become potent engines, by which cunning, ambitious, and unprincipled men will be enabled to subvert the power of the people, and to usurp for themselves the reins of government; destroying afterwards the very engines which have lifted them to unjust dominion.

Towards the preservation of your government and the permanency of your present happy state, it is requisite, not only that you steadily discountenance irregular opposition to its acknowledged authority, but also that you resist with care the spirit of innovation upon its principles, however specious the pretexts. One method of assault may be to effect, in the forms of the constitution, alterations which will impair the energy of the system, and thus to undermine what cannot be directly overthrown. In all the changes to which you may be invited, remember that time and habit are at least as necessary to fix the true character of governments, as of other human institutions:-that experience is the surest standard, by which to test the real tendency of the existing constitution of a country-that facility in changes, upon the credit of mere hypothesis and opinion, exposes to perpetual change from the endless variety of hypothesis and opinion: and remember, especially, that for the efficient management of your common interests in a country so extensive as ours, a government of as much vigor as is consistent with the perfect security of liberty is indispensable. Liberty itself will find in such a government, with powers properly distributed and adjusted, its surest guardian, It is, indeed, little else than a name, where the government is too feeble to withstand the enterprises of faction, to confine each member of the society within the limits prescribed by the laws, and to maintain all in the secure and tranquil enjoyment of the rights of person and property.

I have already intimated to you, the danger of parties in the state, with particular reference to the founding of them on geographical discriminations. Let me now take a more comprehensive view and warn you in the most solemn manner against the baneful effects of the spirit of party generally.

This spirit, unfortunately, is inseparable from our nature, having its root in the strongest passions of the human mind.—It exists under different shapes in all governments, more or less stifled, controlled, or repressed; but in those of the popular form it is seen in its greatest rankness, and is truly their worst enemy.

The alternate domination of one faction over another, sharpened by the spirit of revenge natural to party dissension, which in different ages and countries has perpetrated the most horrid enormities, is itself a frightful despotism.—But this leads at length to a more formal and permanent despotism. The disorders and miseries, which result, gradually incline the minds of men to seek security and repose in the absolute power of an individual; and, sooner or later, the chief of some prevailing faction, more able or more fortunate than his competitors, turns this disposition to the purpose of his own elevation on the ruins of public

Without looking forward to an extremity of this kind, (which nevertheless ought not to be entirely out of sight) the common and continual mischiefs of the spirit of party are sufficient to make it the interest and duty of a wise people to discourage and restrain it.

It serves always to distract the public councils, and enfeeble the public administration. It agitates the community with ill founded jealousies and false alarms; kindles the animosity of one part against another; foments occasionally riot and insurrection. It opens the door to foreign influence and corruption, which find a facilitated access to the government itself through the channels of party passions. Thus the policy and the will of one country are subjected to the policy and will of another.

There is an opinion that parties in free countries are useful checks upon the administration of the government, and serve to keep alive the spirit of liberty. This within certain limits is probably true; and in governments of a monarchical cast, patriotism may look with indulgence, if not with favor, upon the spirit of party. But in those of the popular character, in governments purely elective, it is a spirit not to be encouraged. From their natural tendency, it is certain there will always be enough of that spirit for every salutary purpose. And there being constant danger of excess, the effort ought to be, by force of public opinion, to mitigate and assuage it. A fire not to be quenched, it demands a uniform vigilance to prevent it bursting into flame, lest instead of warming, it should consume.

It is important likewise, that the habits of thinking in a free country should inspire caution in those intrusted with its administration, to confine themselves within their respective constitutional spheres, avoiding in the exercise of the powers of one department, to encroach upon another. The spirit of encroachment tends to consolidate the powers of all the departments in one, and thus to create, whatever the form of government, a real despotism. A just estimate of that love of power and proneness to abuse it which predominate in the human heart, is sufficient to satisfy us of the truth of this position. The necessity of reciprocal checks in the exercise of political power, by dividing and distributing it into different depositories, and constituting each the guardian of the public weal against invasions of the others, has been evinced by experiments ancient and modern: some of them in our country and under our own eyes.—To preserve them must be as necessary as to institute them. If, in the opinion of the people, the distribution or modification of the constitutional powers be in any particular wrong, let it be corrected by an amendment in the way which the constitution designates.—But let there be no change by usurpation; for though this, in one instance, may be the instrument of good, it is the customary weapon by which free governments are destroyed.—The precedent must always greatly overbalance in permanent evil any partial or transient benefit which the use can at any time yield.

Of all the dispositions and habits which lead to political prosperity, Religion and Morality are indispensable supports.-In vain would that man claim the tribute of Patriotism, who should labour to subvert these great pillars of human happiness, these firmest props of the duties of men and citizens. The mere politician, equally with the pious man, ought to respect and to cherish them. A volume could not trace all their connections with private and public felicity. Let it simply be asked, where is the security for property, for reputation, for life, if the sense of religious obligation desert the oaths which are the instruments of investigation in courts of justice? and let us with caution indulge the supposition that morality can be maintained without religion. Whatever may be conceded to the influence of refined education on minds of peculiar structure, reason and experience both forbid us to expect, that national morality can prevail in exclusion of religious principle.

It is substantially true, that virtue or morality is a necessary spring of popular government. The rule, indeed, extends with more or less force to every species of free government. Who that is a sincere friend to it can look with indifference upon attempts to shake the foundation of the fabric?

Promote, then, as an object of primary importance, institutions for the general diffusion of knowledge. In proportion as the structure of a government gives force to public opinion, it should be enlightened.

As a very important source of strength and security, cherish public credit. One method of preserving it is to use it as sparingly as possible, avoiding occasions of expense by cultivating peace, but remembering, also, that timely disbursements, to prepare for danger, frequently prevent much greater disbursements to repel it; avoiding likewise the accumulation of debt, not only by shunning occasions of expense. but by vigorous exertions, in time of peace, to discharge the debts which unavoidable wars may have occasioned, not ungenerously throwing upon posterity the burden which we ourselves ought to bear. The execution of these maxims belongs to your representatives, but it is necessary that public opinion should co-operate. To facilitate to them the performance of their duty, it is essential that you should practically bear in mind, that towards the payment of debts there must be revenue: that to have revenue there must be taxes; that no taxes can be devised which are not more or less inconvenient and unpleasant; that the intrinsic embarrassment inseparable from the selection of the proper object (which is always a choice of difficulties,) ought to be a decisive motive for a candid construction of the conduct of the government in making it, and for a spirit of acquiescence in the measures for obtaining revenue, which the public exigencies may at any time dictate.

Observe good faith and justice towards all nations; cultivate peace and harmony with all. Religion and morality enjoin this conduct, and can it be that good policy does not equally enjoin it? It will be worthy of a free, enlightened, and, at no distant period, a great nation, to give to mankind the magnanimous and too novel example of a people always guided by an exalted justice and benevolence. Who can doubt but, in the course of time and things, the fruits of such a plan would richly repay any temporary advantages which might be lost by a steady adherence to it; can it be, that Providence has not connected the permanent felicity of a nation with its virtue? The experiment, at least, is recommended by every sentiment which ennobles human nature. Alas! is it rendered impossible by its vices?

In the execution of such a plan, nothing is more essential than that permanent, inveterate antipathies against particular nations, and passionate attachments for others, should be excluded; and that, in place of them, just and amicable feelings towards all should be cultivated. The nation, which indulges towards another an habitual hatred, or an habitual fondness, is in some degree a slave. It is a slave to its animosity or to its affection, either of which is sufficient to lead it astray from its duty and its interest. Antipathy in one nation against another, disposes each more readily to offer insult and injury, to lay hold of slight causes of umbrage, and to be haughty and intractable when accidental or trifling occasions of dispute occur. Hence, frequent collisions, obstinate, envenomed, and bloody contests. The nation, prompted by ill will and resentment, sometimes impels to war the government, contrary to the best calculations of policy. The government sometimes participates in the national propensity, and adopts through passion what reason would reject; at other times, it makes the animosity of the nation subservient to projects of hostility instigated by pride, ambition, and other sinister and pernicious motives. The peace often, sometimes perhaps the liberty of nations, has been the victim.

So likewise, a passionate attachment of one nation for another produces a variety of evils. Sympathy for the favorite nation, facilitating the illusion of an imaginary common interest, in cases where no real common interest exists, and infusing into one the enmities of the other, betrays the former into a participation in the quarrels and wars of the latter, without adequate inducements or justification. It leads also to concessions to the favorite nation, of privileges denied to others, which is apt doubly to injure the nation making the concessions, by unnecessarily parting with what ought to have been retained, and by exciting jealousy, ill will, and a disposition to retaliate in the parties from whom equal privileges are withheld; and it gives to ambitious, corrupted or deluded citizens who devote themselves to the favorite nation facility to betray or sacrifice the interests of their own country, without odium, some-times even with popularity; gilding with the appearances of a virtous sense of obligation, a commendable deference for public opinion, or a laudable zeal for public good, the base or foolish compliances of ambition, corruption, or

As avenues to foreign influence in innumerable ways, such attachments are particularly alarming to the truly enlightened and independent patriot. How many opportunities do they afford to tamper with domestic factions, to practice the arts of seduction, to mislead public opinion, to influence or awe the Public Councils!—Such an attachment of a small or weak, towards a great and powerful nation, dooms the former to be the satellite of the latter.

Against the insidious wiles of foreign influence, (I conjure you to believe me fellow-citizens,) the jealousy of a free people ought to be constantly awake; since history and experience prove, that foreign influence is one of the most baneful foes of republican government. But that jealousy, to be useful, must be impartial, else it becomes the instrument of the very influence to be avoided, instead of a defense against it. Excessive partiality for one foreign nation and excessive dislike of another, cause those whom they actuate to see danger only on one side, and serve to veil and even second the arts of influence on the other. Real patriots, who may resist the intrigues of the favorite, are liable to become suspected and odius; while its tools and dupes usurp the applause and confidence of the people, to surrender their interests.

The great rule of conduct for us, in regard to foreign nations, is, in extending our commercial relations, to have with them as little political connection as possible. So far as we have already formed engagements, let them be fulfilled with perfect good faith:—Here let us stop.

Europe has a set of primary interests, which to us have none, or a very remote relation. Hence, she must be engaged in frequent controversies, the causes of which are essentially foreign to our concerns. Hence, therefore, it must be unwise in us to implicate ourselves, by artificial ties, in the ordinary vicissitudes of her politics, or the ordinary combinations and collisions of her friendships or enmittes.

Our detached and distant situation invites and enables us to pursue a different course. If we remain one people, under an efficient government, the period is not far off when we may defy material injury from external annoyance; when we may take such an attitude as will cause the neutrality we may at any time resolve upon, to be scrupulously respected; when belligerent nations, under the impossibility of making acquisitions upon us, will not lightly hazard the giving us provocation, when we may choose peace or war, as our interest, guided by justice, shall counsel.

Why forego the advantages of so peculiar a situation? Why quit our own to stand upon foreign ground? Why, by interweaving our destiny with that of any part of Europe, entangle our peace and prosperity in the toils of European ambition, rivalship, interest, humor, or caprice?

It is our true policy to steer clear of permanent alliance with any portion of the foreign world; so far, I mean, as we are now at liberty to do it; for let me not be understood as capable of patronizing infidelity to existing engagements. I hold the maximum no less applicable to public than private affairs, that honesty is always the best policy. I repeat it, therefore, let those engagements be observed in their genuine sense. But in my opinion, it is unnecessary, and would be unwise to extend them.

Taking care always to keep ourselves by suitable establishments, on a respectable defensive posture, we may safely trust to temporary alliances for extraordinary emergencies.

Harmony, and a liberal intercourse with all nations, are recommended by policy, humanity, and interest. But even our commercial policy should hold an equal and impartial hand: neither seeking nor granting exclusive favors or preferences; consulting the natural course of things; diffusing and diversifying by gentle means the streams of commerce, but forcing nothing; establishing with powers so disposed. in order to give trade a stable course, to define the rights of our merchants, and to enable the government to support them, conventional rules of intercourse, the best that present circumstances and mutual opinion will permit, but temporary, and liable to be from time to time abandoned or varied as experience and circumstances shall dictate; constantly keeping in view, that it is folly in one nation to look for disinterested favors from another; that it must pay with a portion of its independence for whatever it may accept under that character; that by such acceptance, it may place itself in the condition of having given equivalents for nominal favors, and yet of being reproached with ingratitude for not giving more. There can be no greater error than to expect, or calculate upon real favors from nation to nation. It is an illusion which experience must cure, which a just pride ought to discard.

In offering to you, my countrymen, these counsels of an old and affectionate friend, I dare not hope they will make the strong and lasting impression I could wish; that they will control the usual current of the passions, or prevent our nation from running the course which has hitherto marked the destiny of nations; but if I may even flatter myself that they may be productive of some partial benefit, some occasional good; that they may now and then recur to moderate the fury of party spirit, to warn against the mischiesf of foreign intrigue, to guard against the impostures of pretended patriotism; this hope will be full recompense for the solicitude for your welfare by which they have been dictated.

How far, in the discharge of my official duties, I have been guided by the principles which have been delineated, the public records and other evidences of my conduct must witness to you and to the world. To myself, the assurance of my own conscience is, that I have, at least, believed myself to be guided by them.

In relation to the still subsisting war in Europe, my proclamation of the 22d of April, 1793, is the index to my plan. Sanctioned by your approving voice, and by that of your representatives in both houses of congress, the spirit of that measure has continually governed me, uninfluenced by any attempts to deter or divert me from it.

After deliberate examination, with the aid of the best lights I could obtain, I was well satisfied that our country, under all the circumstances of the case, had a right to take, and was bound, in duty and interest, to take a neutral position. Having taken it, I determined, as far as should depend upon me, to maintain it with moderation, perseverance and firmness.

The considerations which respect the right to hold this conduct, it is not necessary on this occasion to detail. I will only observe that, according to my understanding of the matter, that right, so far from being denied by any of the belligerent powers, has been virtually admitted by all.

The duty of holding a neutral conduct may be inferred, without any thing more, from the obligation which justice and humanity impose on every nation, in cases in which it is free to act, to maintain inviolate the relations of peace and amity towards other nations.

The inducements of interests for observing that conduct will best be referred to your own reflections and experience. With me, a predominant motive has been to endeavor to gain time to our country to settle and mature its yet recent institutions, and to progress without interruption, to that degree of strength, and consistency which is necessary to give it, humanly speaking, the command of its own fortunes.

Though in reviewing the incidents of my administration, I am unconscious of intentional error, I am nevertheless too sensible of my defects not to think it probable that I may have committed many errors. Whatever they may be, I fervently beseech the Almighty to avert or mitigate the evils to which they may tend. I shall also carry with me the hope that my country will never cease to view them with indulgence; and that, after forty-five years of my life dedicated to its service, with an upright zeal, the faults of incompetent abilities will be consigned to oblivion, as myself must soon be to the mansions of rest.

Relying on its kindness in this as in other things, and actuated by that fervent love towards it, which is so natural to a man who views in it the native soil of himself and his progenitors for several generations; I anticipate with pleasing expectation that retreat in which I promise myself to realize, without alloy, the sweet enjoyment of partaking, in the midst of my fellow citizens, the benign influence of good laws under a free government—the ever favorite object of my heart, and the happy reward, as I trust, of our mutual cares, labors, and dangers.

GEO. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, 17th September, 1796.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for 5 minutes.

Mr. CULLEN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object—and I am not going to object—we want to pass this appropriation bill today. If we are going to have 5- and 10-minute speeches on everything and anything, it will hold up the passage of this legislation. I am not going to object to the gentleman's request, but I think we ought to have some consideration for this appropriation bill.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, we were rather generous in agreeing to meet at 11 o'clock this morning.

Mr. CULLEN. I am not going to object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, after we have listened to the immortal words of George Washington on this, his anniversary, and we think of the challenge he has laid down to every Member of the Congress, it seems to me there could be nothing more fitting than to carry out, to the best of our ability, those things which he practiced and to obey the teaching he has given us.

I would ask that every Member of the House to again read this address as just read by my colleague from Pennsylvania. I think it would do us all a lot of good.

It seems to me when Washington did all that he could for his country and for every man who lived in the country at that time in order that they might support the Constitution of the United States and assist in building up this country to be the greatest country in the world, it behooves each and every Member of the Congress to give his time and attention to the duties of his office, so that each Member of the Congress may serve his country in trying to do those things which will continue the Constitution of the United States and keep the country under Old Glory, the flag which we have back of the Speaker at the present time, the Stars and Stripes, the Red, White, and Blue.

It grieves me very much when I pick up this morning's paper and I see some of the things we read there:

Speaker Byans created an uproar yesterday at a caucus of House Democrats on patronage when he announced at least 10,000 jobs as superintendents and foremen in charge of the camps would be distributed among "deserving" members of the party recommended by Congressmen.

mended by Congressmen.

Between bursts of tumultuous applause the Speaker assured his job-hungry followers their leather-lunged protests against failure of the new deal to consult House Members in distributing spoils have borne fruit.

The vacancies, some to be created by broad expansion of the C. C. C., will be filled promptly, Byrns said. He indicated there would be an average of six jobs to each camp, paying from $110 to $200 a month. The Speaker promised Senators would have no say-so on such patronage.

The thing that is in my mind today is that since we are going to have no say in patronage, I want to warn you, Mr. Speaker, I do not want southern Democrats from Alabama, from Georgia, from Tennessee, or from Texas, or any other State, coming into the State of Pennsylvania and taking jobs that ought to be there for Pennsylvanians.

I want to say that if the Senators are not going to make the appointments, they ought to be appointed on merit, and we should insist on men who are qualified to do the job properly. This is no time for us to be playing politics.

I want to say to the Members of this House that if you will try to do the things that George Washington inculcated in his last address you will be doing your duty, you will assume your responsibility, and you will not be shoving everything over to the other end of the Avenue and getting your orders and then coming here and acting like a bunch of men who do not think for themselves but say, "All right, I will agree to anything that you send down here and put it through."

I want to say that the President of the United States is unable to assume the great responsibilities you are placing upon him. They are your responsibilities, and you must assume them.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. HIGGINS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 3 minutes.

Mr. CULLEN. Mr. Speaker, I did not object to the request of the gentleman who addressed the House a few moments ago, but I am now going to reserve the right to object until I know what the Members are going to talk about. I understand the gentleman who has just asked for permission to address the House is going to bring to the attention of the House the death of a former Member.

Mr. HIGGINS of Massachusetts. That is right. Mr. CULLEN. I have no objection, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. HIGGINS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I desire today to call to the attention of the Members of the House the death of a former Member of Congress who represented the district I now have the honor to represent, Hon. Joseph H. O'Neil, of Boston. He spent practically his entire life in the service of the people of our city. His public career commenced with his election to the Massachusetts House of Representatives in 1878, and he served with distinction in that body until 1884. His brilliant record in the legislature, his independence in thought, and his loyalty to the then Governor of our Commonwealth, Gen. Benjamin Butler, caused him to follow Governor Butler into the Peoples Party movement in 1884, when the general was an unsuccessful candidate for President of the United States. President Cleveland appointed Mr. O'Neil as Assistant Treasurer of the United States, and upon terminating his duties in that office he served three consecutive and distinctive terms as a Member of this House.

Upon his retirement from Congress he organized the Federal Trust Co., one of the largest banks in our city, and of which he was president for 23 years. In 1918 he was the Democratic candidate for Lieutenant Governor of Massachusetts, and in 1925 made final and unsuccessful attempt in politics as a candidate for mayor of Boston.

Joe O'Neil had the happy faculty of making friends and holding them. He was tolerant and generous, and numbered among his friends all classes, creeds, and races. For many years past he had been a trustee of the Massachusetts General Hospital, named by Republican and Democratic Governors alike at the expiration of his terms.

The character of the man, and the type of unselfish service he rendered to the city, State, and Nation, is ably portrayed by the pen of Clifton Carberry, editorial writer for the Boston Post and one of the foremost journalists of our time, who, in an editorial of February 20, 1935, wrote as | could well be recited by every Member of Congress in the follows:

A life spent unselfishly—working for others—was the life of Joseph Henry O'Neil. In humble graciousness he accepted the honors that came to him. With zealous, uncomplaining courage he carried burdensome responsibilities. When the State wanted best man to serve its interests as trustee of the Massachusetts the best man to serve its interests as trustee of the Massachusetts General Hospital a Republican Governor called upon him. His activities covered a wide range, far beyond the scope of his own interests. He knew the meaning of true humanitarianism, for his heart was truly great. The Working Boys' Home, the St. Vincent de Paul Society, St. Elizabeths Hospital, and a host of other organizations and individuals, too, received his kindly, generous, far-seeing assistance. His was a life of good works. Boston and Massachusetts can ill afford to lose him.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I am very much moved by the announcement of Mr. Higgins of the death of my late friend, former Congressman Joseph H. O'Neil, who served the Commonwealth of Massachusetts with great distinction in this body in the Fifty-first, Fifty-second, and Fifty-third Congresses-March 4, 1889-March 3, 1895. It is not my purpose to refer to his public service, which was outstanding in its character, and which covered so many years, as our colleague Mr. Higgins has ably and properly mentioned the same. My remarks are more from the personal sense. I have known the late Congressman for the past 15 years, and I am deeply indebted to him for many kind words of counsel and advice. I have gone to him on many occasions for his advice, which was always sound and logical. He possessed a sincere and logical mind, which, as years went by, became keener and keener. He spent his life unselfishly-working for others, always trying to assist those in trouble or in less fortunate position than himself. In humble graciousness he accepted the honors that came to him. With zealous, uncomplaining courage he carried burdensome responsibilities. His was a life of good works. He has given a lifetime of service to Nation, State, and city, and leaves behind him a broad circle of friends, to whom his absence will be felt keenly.

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 5 minutes.

Mr. CULLEN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, on what subject does the gentleman intend to talk?

Mr. GILLETTE. On a matter of commemorative interest to the soldiers.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. Speaker, on this occasion, commemorative of the birth of the greatest American soldier, and when his message to the American people has been so fittingly and effectively read by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Driscoll], I hope my colleagues will not consider it amiss that I have asked for these few minutes to do an act of simple justice to another great American soldier, not a commander in chief but a buck private of Infantry, not known to every man, woman, and child, but unknown, but who likewise left a message of consecration to public service for the people of the United States under dramatic circumstances.

I felt it would be lost to future Americans if we did not preserve it in the RECORD of the proceedings of this House.

In 1917 Martin Treptow was living in my home town in Iowa. He was engaged in the trade of a barber. He had an eighth-grade education. He enlisted in the Rainbow Division and went to France. As a runner employed by the battalion and at the Battle of Chateau-Thierry he was hit by a shell and killed instantly. As his remains were carried from the field his clothing was searched for any mementos to be sent to his family, and they found a diary, and on the flyleaf appeared this pledge. He designated it as "My Pledge." This was published by papers in Paris, and by a number in the United States, and was quoted by President Wilson as the "Treptow pledge." But a very few people know of it, and for fear it will disappear I want to have it in the RECORD, and so I have asked for this time.

As I say, this boy was unlettered, but I do not believe that for simplicity of expression, for purity of diction, any passage in literature contains such a gem of diction. I think it struggle we are engaged in.

Here is Martin Treptow's pledge:

America must win this war. Therefore, I will work, I will save, will sacrifice, I will endure, I will fight and do my utmost as if the whole issue of the struggle depended on me alone.

And Martin Treptow did his utmost. [Applause.]

Mr. EKWALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 minutes to pay a tribute to a nation which has paid its duty in full to the United States-the Republic of Finland.

Mr. CULLEN. Reserving the right to object, what is the gentleman going to talk about?

Mr. EKWALL. A resolution of thanks to the Republic of Finland for having paid its debt.

Mr. CULLEN. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. EKWALL. Mr. Speaker, in this day and age, when many nations have shamelessly repudiated their just debts to us, we might pause for a few moments in the busy affairs of life to give due recognition to a small nation whose action, in my judgment, has been a beacon light in the darkness and one which should be emulated by other great nations of the world.

Our country came to the assistance of a number of nations during the World War when they were hard pressed, fighting for their very existence, with their backs against the wall, so to speak, and we gave unstintingly of our men and our money and our substance that we might aid those nations to perpetuate representative government in this world. Those nations were very, very solicitous of our friendship and our help during those trying times, but in the following years after victory perched on their banners, when the danger was removed, and we asked them to pay their just obligations. many of those great nations, much more able to pay, have refused to do so; and it has been left to a small nation, the Republic of Finland, to stand like the Rock of Gibraltar through the sea of broken obligations. I think we should give this Republic a vote of thanks. We have wealthy nations, such as France and Great Britain, who refuse to pay any portion of their obligation to us, yet we find Great Britain today in a wave of prosperity, so they tell us, in better financial condition than many other nations.

Mr. McFARLANE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EKWALL. Yes; I yield.

Mr. McFARLANE. Will the gentleman kindly insert in his remarks a list of the nations in default and the amount they owe?

Mr. EKWALL. I shall be glad to do that when I extend my remarks, but I am not sure of all of them, and I do not want to do an injustice to any nation. Undoubtedly Great Britain is in position to make at least a friendly gesture by paying us some portion of the obligation they owe us. France, which cannot pay a dollar to us, so they say, is nevertheless said to be loaning hundreds of millions of dollars to other countries. As I say, the Republic of Finland, a small country which has been buffeted around by the great nations of Europe for centuries, and which is none too sound financially, has come forward honestly and honorably and has paid our obligation in full to date.

Rather than take up too much time, Mr. Speaker, I wish to read a joint resolution which I am introducing, and then I should like permission to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. EKWALL. The resolution is as follows:

Joint resolution extending the thanks of the Government and people of the United States to the Republic of Finland

Be it resolved, etc., That the President of the United States is Be it resolved, etc., That the President of the United States is requested to extend the thanks of the Government of the United States and of the American people to the Republic of Finland for the prompt, full, and satisfactory manner in which the Republic of Finland discharged its obligation to the Government of the United States in accordance with the agreement between the two Republics for the settlement of the debt contracted during the World War by the Republic of Finland with the Government of the United States

A similiar resolution has recently been introduced in the State Legislature of Oregon by Representative Norblad, of Clatsop County.

Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that this Republic of Finland has followed the admonition of the great English playwright, poet, and litterateur, William Shakespeare, when he wrote these memorable lines:

This above all: to thine own self be true,

And it must follow, as the night the day, thou canst not then be false to any man.

I am sure that this same great Englishman, if he were alive today, would admonish his compatriots to pay their just obligations and debts.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EKWALL. I yield.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. In view of what the gentleman has said and in view of the need of a legation in Finland, I beg to advise the gentleman there is a bill before the Committee on Foreign Affairs for that appropriation at this time. I presume the gentleman would support such a bill?

Mr. EKWALL. I certainly would.

May I say this: That if the various governments which owe us upward of $12,000,000,000 were to pay their obligations, or make an honest effort to pay at least a portion of them, within their real ability to do so, we would have money with which to take care of the aged and of the needy people in our country at this time. We would have sufficient means to take care of the blind, the crippled, and the unfortunate in our country generally, and to give work to our unemployed without being compelled to borrow billions of dollars for public works. We could take care of them much more liberally than we can under present circumstances, and these defaulting nations could once again reestablish the feeling of respect and confidence which their unwarranted actions have seriously impaired.

Mr. SISSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EKWALL. I yield.

Mr. SISSON. Would the gentleman have those countries pay us in goods or gold?

Mr. EKWALL. Anything would be better than the way they are paying us now.

At the request of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. McFar-LANE], I am inserting the only available data which I have been able to secure on short notice showing a list of nations in default and the amount they owe:

NOTE.—Finland, with a total debt of $8,726,645.63, has met every payment when due.

The situation will change on June 15, 1934, when further installments fall due, as follows:

Great Britain, $85,670,765; France, $59,000,218; Italy, $14,741,593;
Belgium, $7,159,453; Poland, $4,039,039; Czechoslovakia, $1,682,812;
Rumania, $1,248,750; Estonia, $322,850; Yugoslavia, $800,000; Finland, $166,538; Lithuania, $147,864; Latvia, $134,883; Hungary, $32,669.

Another fact which should be mentioned is that the Republic of Finland is paying 3-percent interest on her indebtedness. The present interest charge is fixed for Finland by H. R. 5557, Sixty-eighth Congress. Let me say that Finland funded her debt early and agreed to pay the sum of $8,282,000 in 62 years. She did not wait to drive the hard bargain that some of the other debtor nations subsequently made.

The description of this indebtedness as war debts is a misnomer. Much of the money loaned to these nations they used for internal rehabilitation. A large part of these funds were used by these various countries in the construction of highways, railways, and port development. This fact makes the existing repudiation all the more defenseless.

For the information of the House, permit me to state that the amount of the entire war indebtedness, principal and interest, as funded over a period of 62 years is $22,188,436,000. As you well know, France, Austria, Belgium, Czechoslovakia, Estonia, Germany, Great Britain, Greece, Hungary, Italy, Latvia, Lithuania, Poland, Rumania, Yugoslavia, Armenia, and Russia are in default. Finland alone has steadfastly maintained her national integrity by paying on this indebtedness. It is stated on excellent authority that Finland is more or less outlawed by the other debtor countries for the reason that she has refused to join in this concert of repudia-

It is pertinent at this time to state that the approximate annual disbursements for armament of the countries in default is $2,000,000,000 per year. One-fourth of this disbursement would be sufficient to carry on the engagements made by the defaulting nations on the various debt settlements. In the debt settlements we wiped out the sum of approximately $10,000,000,000, for which we gave them a receipt in full.

It cannot be repeated too often that under the Treaty of Versailles we took none of the spoils of war. We received not a dollar in reparations and not a square foot of land. Our defaulting debtors, on the other hand, were tremendously benefited by the acquisition of the German colonies, or in other material ways.

We must not let the world forget that much of the money that was loaned to the defaulting nations was received by them after the armistice. Some of it was involved in the sale to France for $400,000,000 of property, food, building material, railroad equipment, and other types of property valued at $2,000,000,000. This sum of $400,000,000 was subsequently merged into the war-debt settlement, and, of course, has never been paid. The enforced collection of this indebtedness is probably impossible; but we of the present generation should not permit our children and, so far as we can keep the story alive, future generations to forget this repudiation. The fact is that our people for many generations will be paying the obligations which these debtors have repudiated.

It is my belief that integrity is more vital in a nation even than in an individual. The wholesome example given these defaulting nations by Finland is my reason for offering this resolution.

Finland is in the far north. It has an area of about | 133,000 square miles and a population estimated at 3,611,791. It already has one of the best common-school systems of any nation in the world. Ninety-three percent of its population, over 15 years of age, are literate. Its people are remarkable athletes. This race has written a bright chapter in the history of the nation's struggle for racial freedom and integrity. They have had a long fight to maintain their nationalism. For centuries they were a subject people under the domination of Sweden and Russia. This gallant young Republic was born on December 9, 1917, and a constitutional form of government established. Since then this people have battled bravely and successfully against the introduction of bolshevism and communistic influence.

This young and struggling sister Republic deserves our encouragement. Her refusal to join in the concert of nations who have repudiated their just debts to America indicates the high integrity of their government. This is a reflection of real national character.

A splendid recognition would be as suggested by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McReynolds] that we authorize the building of a legation in Finland which will be a real expression of our gratitude and good will. [Applause.] [Here the gavel fell.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Horne, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 1190) entitled "An act to regulate interstate and foreign commerce in petroleum and its products by prohibiting the shipment in such commerce of petroleum and its products produced in violation of State law, and for other purposes."

WAR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL, 1936

Mr. PARKS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 5913) making appropriations for the military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 5913, with Mr. HILL of Alabama in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

No appropriation made in this act shall be available for pay, allowances, or traveling or other expenses of any officer of the Organized Reserves who may be drawing a pension, disability allowance, disability compensation, or retired pay from the Government of the United States.

Mr. BIERMANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. This bill calls for a total appropriation of $378,-000,000. On page 5 of the report it is set out that emergency funds to the extent of $74,000,000 will be added. That makes a total of $452,000,000 that the War Department will have to expend next year. In addition to that, according to the statement of the chairman yesterday, there will be considerable additional funds from the emergency set-ups.

I want this Committee to be duly impressed with the meaning of $452,000,000 as an appropriation before they vote for it. That equals $51,598 an hour, 24 hours a day, for every day of the fiscal year for which the appropriation is made.

If we did not spend that money on the War Department, I | military powers shows the following: want to call to your attention some of the other things that we could get for it. In Iowa we have some pretty good heavy pavements, 18 feet wide. This appropriation which I have mentioned would build that kind of pavement, 18-foot heavy concrete pavement, from Washington to Bismarck, N. Dak. It would build another similar road from Washington to Boston; another one from Washington to Charleston, S. C.; another one from Washington to Chicago; another concrete road from Washington to Denver; another one from Washington to Galveston, Tex.; another one from Washington to Los Angeles, Calif.; another 18-foot concrete pavement from Washington to New York; another 18-foot concrete pavement from Washington to Portland, Oreg. After having done all this there would still be left money enough to build in the county seat of each of the 99 counties of the State of Iowa a $100,000 hospital and endow each one of these hospitals with $100,000. In addition it would put up a $2,000,000 library in each capital of the 48 States of this country; it would endow the three colleges of my district in Iowa, Luther, Lenox, and Upper Iowa University, with $1,000,000 apiece; and then, lastly, but not least, it would leave almost $10,000,000 to establish a department of peace, with a Secretary in the President's Cabinet, the principal duty of which department would be to instill into the congressional mind that all history teaches that armament races end in war; and that for this Nation to enter that race is the most stupendous and incredible folly.

The other day, when there were not many Members here, I called attention to the fact that the Democratic Party in 1932 made a solemn promise to carry out its platform pledges to the people of this country if intrusted with power. Among those pledges was one to reduce the expenses of our country for armament. A Democrat who votes for this appropriation granting, in effect, $452,000,000 for the Army alone, according to my view, is violating the pledge of the Democratic platform upon which he was elected to this Congress.

I have tried to discover against what nation we are preparing, but no one in this House has been able to tell us against what nation we are preparing. They say we are not preparing against any nation; we are just preparing, just preparing. Before this bill is passed I should like to have someone tell me against what nation we are preparing. what war we are anticipating. [Applause.]

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BIERMANN. I yield.

Mr. CULKIN. The gentleman's discussion is most interesting, but I am wondering if he is willing to follow the same analogy in the matter of the police forces in the municipalities of the country.

Mr. BIERMANN. There is a distinct difference between a police force and an army.

Mr. CULKIN. Are there not international problems similar in nature to municipal problems in the matter of keeping order?

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LUCKEY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, during the discussion on this military appropriations bill there have been made a great number of statements that I feel call for further comment and elucidation. I want to state at the outset that I am not opposed to, or finding fault with, a program for reasonable and adequate preparedness. What I propose to criticize is the alleged low state of preparedness as stated here on the floor of the House by the proponents of this bill in the face of the enormous sums expended by our Government for that nurpose

It has been stated that our Army ranks sixteenth in comparative strength with those of the other powers. It has been repeatedly asserted that we are woefully unprepared, and that this was all due to the fact that we are not appropriating sufficient funds for this purpose. Let us examine the facts.

An examination of the relative strength of the leading

If we examine the appropriations of these same powers, we find that their appropriations for national defense were as follows:

United States	$650, 149, 600
England	580, 085, 404
France	594, 115, 227
Italy	327, 787, 191
Japan	424, 769, 158

According to the statement of Senator NyE, the United States has, since 1913, led the world in the increase of armaments. Those figures are as follows:

1934

Per control of the second of t	cent
United States	197
Japan	142
England	42
France	30
Italy	44
Russia	30

Maj. Gen. Johnson Hagood, commander of the Seventh Corps Area, in a speech in Kansas City, April 1933, described the Army as top-heavy and extravagant:

So far as the Army is concerned we have too many bureaus already, and we could spare six or eight of them with advantage to the national defense and to the joy of the taxpayer. * * The Army has too many overlapping agencies. We are overstaffed. I have twice as many staff officers, clerks, and orderlies as I need, but I cannot get rid of them under the existing set-up. Our system of administration and supply is so complicated and involved that it would collapse at the outbreak of the next war, just as it has collapsed at the outbreak of every war in the past.

To show some of the waste, if not outright graft, let me summarize a small portion of a recent work on this subject. The tremendous waste resulting from overstocking is illustrated when the Army in 1932 sold goods which had cost $9,155,000 for $687,399. One part of this sale consisted of 1,100,000 pairs of winter drawers, which had cost $1,375,000. This lot was sold for $159,500. Is it possible that there was a change of style so radical as to render these particular garments obsolete or unfit for use?

This is just one item. Scores of others could be mentioned of like or similar nature. We lead in the amount expended on national defense, yet find ourselves sixteenth in military strength among the powers of the world. This year our combined expenditures for national defense under the proposed appropriation will nearly reach the fantastic amount of $1,000,000,000. Basing this estimate on $1,000,000,000, in comparison with the comparatively paltry amounts appropriated by the other powers, we might be able to advance our position to about the eighth place in relative military strength. In the past we have spent far greater amounts than the leading military powers, yet we find ourselves sixteenth on this list. It seems indisputable that the fault lies, if fault there is, not in the amount appropriated but in the manner in which those funds are administered.

We claim that we are for peace, yet we are in the forefront in this armament race. Where are we going to stop and where are we going to land? Are our appropriations to be made greater every year? Napoleon Bonaparte once said, after most of his delusions of military grandeur were gone and his whole scheme of world dominance had crumbled at his feet:

The more I study the world, the more I am convinced of the inability of brute force to create anything durable.

If we plunge into the vicious circle of the military preparation, we must do it with our eyes open. The armament race of 1902 to 1914, and its disastrous consequences, are too fresh before us to allow us to ignore them. We need an adequate and reasonable national defense, but the problem of attaining and maintaining that defense is not one of increasing appropriations but is one of elimination of waste and inefficiency within our Army. Is there any valid reason why the American dollar should not go as far as that of the European powers?

By unanimous consent the pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

No appropriation made in this act shall be expended for the pay of a reserve officer on active duty for a longer period than 15 days, except such as may be detailed for duty with the War Department General Staff under section 3a and section 5 (b) of the Army Reorganization Act approved June 4, 1920 (U. S. C., title 10, secs. 26, 37), or who may be detailed for courses of instruction at the general or special service schools of the Army, or who may be detailed for duty as instructors at civilian military training camps, appropriated for in this act, or who may be detailed for duty with tactical units of the Air Corps, as provided in section 37a of the Army Reorganization Act approved June 4, 1920 (U. S. C., title 10, sec. 369): Provided, That the pay and allowances of such additional officers and nurses of the Medical Reserve Corps as are required to supplement the like officers and nurses of the Regular Army in the care of beneficiaries of the United States Veterans' Administration treated in Army hospitals may be paid from the funds allotted to the War Department by that administration under existing law.

Mr. WITHROW. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, under the War Department appropriation for the fiscal year 1936 there is a material increase over the fiscal year 1935, an increase to the extent of approximately $50,000,000, making the total amount appropriated in the bill $378,000,000; but this is not the entire picture. I believe it is conservative to say that at least $100,000,000 more of Public Works money will be spent by other governmental agencies under the jurisdiction and for the benefit of the War Department. For example, in the State of Texas alone the General Staff has approved and recommended on five projects calling for the expenditure of more than $20,000,000. So, in reality, instead of appropriating $378,000,000 to the War Department we are appropriating possibly $500,000,000—a half billion dollars for military purposes.

Mr. BOLTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WITHROW. I yield.

Mr. BOLTON. It should be understood, however, that that is not a War Department expenditure; it is not for military purposes, at least.

Mr. WITHROW. Military and nonmilitary expenditures; yes, indeed. I just wonder, Mr. Chairman, how many Members there are in this House who would support this War Department appropriation bill if it actually did contain, as it should, $500,000,000?

Mr. BIERMANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. WITHROW. I yield.

Mr. BIERMANN. There would be plenty of men in this House who would vote for a $500,000,000 bill, a $600,000,000 bill, or a $700,000,000 bill for the War Department, given sufficient time to spread enough propaganda to plant the seeds of fear and distrust upon which this bill is based.

Mr. WITHROW. I yield to no Member in the desire to provide adequate national defense; but I do feel that this measure, in conjunction with the other moneys that will be spent by other governmental agencies, is going beyond the point of providing for adequate national defense. Now, I want to make just one or two observations in regard to this. During the time that I have served as a Member of Congress this body has always been more liberal with the War Department and the Navy Department than the other departments; and, by the way, this appropriation, as you all know, has nothing to do with the Navy Department; they, too, will come in asking an appropriation, and large as this appropriation is, the Navy Department will dwarf it.

We have always been more liberal with the War Department and with the Navy Department than with the other branches of government, and I want to contrast our treatment of these two defense arms with the treatment we have afforded other groups.

I have in mind the action of the House when we turned authority over to General Hines, the present head of the Veterans' Administration, and to Lew Douglas, who was then the Director of the Budget, to crucify the disabled veterans of our Nation; and crucify them they did. We are not as liberal to our disabled veterans as we are to our War Department.

In addition, I want to call attention to the treatment this Appropriations Committee has afforded the dairy farmers of our Nation.

In 1934, under a very strict gag rule that would not allow the offer of amendments, we passed what was known as a "beef and dairy relief measure", providing $200,000,000 for the relief of beef and dairy farmers. The reason that bill I was brought in under a strict gag rule was because it was realized that if an opportunity were given that amount would have been materially increased.

The measure went over to the Senate and the Senate put another $50,000,000 in the appropriation, making a total of $250,000,000. Then what happened? When, as is the custom, the deficiency bill was brought it, the Appropriations Committee, which is supposed to be a servant of the House, did not recommend an item providing for $250,000,000 for dairy relief.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WITHROW. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. WITHROW. Mr. Chairman, did they include in that deficiency appropriation an item providing for $250,000,000 for dairy relief which the House had previously authorized? No. They brought in an item of $150,000,000 and shortchanged the dairy farmers of the Northwest to the extent of $100,000,000. I just want to bring to your attention that it was the same Appropriations Committee which did that knowingly despite the fact that the dairy farmer is in dire need of aid because he has been penalized by the activities of the A. A. A., N. R. A., and other governmental agencies.

In conclusion, may I say that we have been mighty liberal in appropriating the taxpayers' money to the War Department and to the Navy Department. May I ask that we be equally liberal with our dairy farmers when we ask the Appropriations Committee to bring in an appropriation of $100,000,000 for the dairy farmers of the Northwest, and all over the country. I sincerely hope that you gentlemen will not protest when we ask that the dairy farmer be granted funds to relieve his dire distress. I demand that our dairy farmers, our veterans, and our ordinary citizens receive the same consideration which we are giving to our national defense. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, no man in this House has been stronger against militarism than I have been, but I am not a spineless pacifist that will rock along and let conditions arise that might overcome us in a time of great emergency.

National defense has two purposes, one to repel any invasion of our country, and another to put down any internal disorder that may arise. If my colleague will read the evidence brought before the committee by the adjutant generals of the various States and by high officers of the National Guard, as well as by the General Staff, they will see that every provision in this bill for national defense is most conservative and reasonable.

I do not see how anyone can read the testimony of Adjutant General Howard, of the great State of California, and not be keenly alive to the necessity of having reasonable preparedness.

Adjutant General Howard showed us a state of anarchy, a condition of absolute revolution, which covered a period of three whole days intensely, and threatened the peace of California, the peace of the United States, and the peace of the world for several months. This condition still exists.

I am not one of those who is willing to sit here idly and refuse to appropriate the necessary amount of money to make reasonable preparedness, because overnight a condition might arise that would cause the expenditure of hundreds of millions of dollars and the lives of thousands of men before it could be corrected.

Mr. BIERMANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. BIERMANN. What kind of condition does the gentleman anticipate? What does he imagine or dream is going to happen?

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will mittee, and if he will go over this record, as the gentleman from Texas has just stated, he will find plenty of reasons why this increase is justified at the present time.

Mr. BIERMANN. The gentleman undoubtedly has read the testimony. Will he tell us?

Mr. McMILLAN. Read in the printed hearings on this bill the testimony of the adjutant generals of the various States, which the gentleman from Texas has referred to already. This condition exists not alone in California but in many other States of this country. He will find reasons in the hearings.

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. BIER-MANN] will read the testimony of Adjutant General Howard. that evidence alone ought to convince him of the necessity of passing this bill. I think it is most conservative.

Mr. Chairman, while I am for peace, and I do not believe in continual strife between nations or between individuals, I want to see the Government of the United States so strong that it can handle any kind of a condition that may arise, internally or otherwise. [Applause.] We are giving the President in this bill what the President wants. We are giving to the President in this bill what the General Staff of the Army say is absolutely necessary to preserve the peace of the United States. We are giving to this country in this bill that which the adjutant generals of our States say is absolutely necessary if we want to be able to preserve peace in our land. It is what the President wants.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BIERMANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the

Mr. Chairman, I rise particularly to answer the question of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Culkin], who asked whether I would favor disbanding the police forces of the United States. Well, that is a sophistical argument used to support these huge appropriations and has been made from time immemorial.

There is a very vast difference between a police force and an army. A police force is calculated to enforce recognized rules of law and conduct. An army is calculated to settle differences without any rules of conduct, without any law, or without rules governing the difficulty in dispute.

I was interested in what the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. Blanton] stated.

Mr. CULKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BIERMANN. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CULKIN. The gentleman is getting me into the realm of international law. I am going to ask him if he will state to the House what the object of war is.

Mr. BIERMANN. That is entering into the domain of philosophy further than I want to go.

Mr. CULKIN. I will tell the gentleman what the answer is-the purpose of war is peace.

Mr. BIERMANN. The gentleman has made a discovery that people up to this time and all during the last five or six thousand years have not discovered.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. BIERMANN. I yield.

Mr. SISSON. I have asked the gentleman to yield merely to ask the gentleman from New York a question, or rather, perhaps, to make this comment: Will the gentleman point out to us any war in which the United States has been engaged, with the possible exception of the war from 1861 to 1865, which produced any lasting benefit, and I shall not even except the Civil War? There has never been a war in which the country has engaged, except the war which Jefferson said was fought for the sacred right of revolution, which has accomplished anything of permanent good or has accomplished anything but evil and suffering.

Mr. CULKIN. The gentleman is classic in his allusions, and, of course, general. He forgets the Revolutionary War.

Mr. SISSON. I excepted it. Mr. CULKIN. And the War of 1812. Mr. SISSON. I do not except the War of 1812. The War of 1812 was absolutely unnecessary and accomplished no read the hearings, and if he had appeared before the com- lasting good any more than the Mexican War or the Spanish-American War, which the jingoes of the country, together with the jingo newspapers of Hearst, brought on.

Mr. CULKIN. I am going to let the gentleman who has the floor answer the distinguished gentleman from New York in his own time. I regret I cannot impose further on the time of the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. BIERMANN. I want to refer to something the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Blanton] said a while ago. gentleman said that the General Staff, the Adjutant General's Office, and the representatives of the National Guard from all over the country indicate that we need more appropriations. I should like to have the well-informed members of this committee who have read these hearings that they want us all to read, to tell this House of a single year in the history of this Republic when the War Department and all these Army officials did not ask for more and more and more money.

I wonder if there is anyone in this Hall this afternoon who has the slightest idea that if we grant this appropriation that these same forces will not come in next year and ask for a vastly increased appropriation. They want more and more money all the time and I call the attention of men on this side to the fact that this appropriation is a distinct violation of the platform upon which we were elected and I defy any of you to disprove this statement.

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BIERMANN. I yield.
Mr. McMILLAN. Do I assume from the gentleman's argument that the Chief of Staff, the General Staff, and other high Army officers, as well as the enlisted men of the Army, are in favor of war?

Mr. BIERMANN. I am not going into an examination of the morality of the people who gave this testimony.

Mr. McMILLAN. The gentleman is making the statement that they come here year after year asking for an increase in these funds.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. Is not that the fact?

Mr. McMILLAN. Does the gentleman assume from that that they are all in favor of war?

Mr. BIERMANN. I assume, and it is a safe assumption, they do it from a biased or narrow viewpoint and they want more and more appropriations all the time.

Mr. McMILLAN. I may say to the gentleman that the hearings show in place after place that the Secretary of War, the General Staff, and, in fact, every man who appeared before the committee representing the War Department is in favor of peace and against war.

Mr. BIERMANN. But none of them has told us against what nation we are preparing.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. KENNEY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, the appropriation in this bill is very, very generous; but after all, we must have an adequate national defense, and the provisions of the bill show that the committee has recognized that aviation in the future will be our most important and first line of defense.

A large amount of money is being appropriated for aviation purposes. There has been an increase from something like $26,000,000 to $45,000,000. If we are to have an outstanding air force, and we should have it, sufficient money should be provided, of course. I hope, however, that this appropriation will not strain the Budget so that there may not be left about $25,000 or $30,000 for purposes which I shall mention presently. It is necessary for us to promote and foster education and training in aviation. We believe in progress and aviation is progress. Many superstitions blind flying and use of the radio beam. It is to be hoped that in the Army aviation schools the best and most advanced instruction will be imparted. Given the facilities, our American pilots will develop and excel.

The Military Academy at West Point a few days ago announced that in the future its cadets would be given instruction in aviation and trained to fly as a part of their course at the Academy.

The great University of Notre Dame, according to the press, is about to add to its curricula a course in aeronautical engineering. A high school in my district now offers instruction in aviation to its students. Other instances may be cited of the advance in the teaching of aviation and its correlated subjects.

Unquestionably we are going forward to a rapid development of aviation in this country. The trail has been blazed by great, fearless flyers. Thrilled and amazed by their accomplishments and awakened to the importance of the plane and its uses, we are ready to support and enthusiastically boost aviation in all its phases. But, if we are to inculcate the proper knowledge of, and interest in, aviation, we should build up from the ground. We, therefore, must concern ourselves with the youth of the country.

It may, then, be said that Congress has been put to shame by a movement started about a year ago by the liberal, public-spirited William Randolph Hearst. The movement took concrete form in the Nation-wide organization known as the "Junior Birdmen of America." It is an organization of splendid young boys and girls interested in aviation residing in all sections of the country. Its membership is now about 175,000, and that membership is growing daily. It has come into being only because of the liberality and progressiveness of the far-sighted Mr. Hearst.

The purpose of that organization is to furnish to the youth of the Nation the means of acquiring the rudiments of flying and ingraining in them the basic principles of aerodynamics in order to promote the cause of aviation in all its phases. Mr. Hearst has already expended in the cause, according to estimate, in the neighborhood of $200,000, besides contributing the columns of his newspapers in instructing and enthusing the youth of the country in the principles of aviation.

Congress has yet to take any advanced step in carrying aviation to our youth, but it can and ought to do so. There is a simple and inexpensive way at hand. That way is by establishing an aviation bureau in the office of the Commissioner of Education in the Department of Interior for the purpose of providing information on aviation to the public schools of the country and birdmen and other aviation organizations as set forth in a bill introduced by me yesterday, and I now ask leave, Mr. Chairman, to incorporate this bill in my remarks at this point.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered. The bill referred to is as follows:

A bill to establish an Aviation Bureau in the office of the Com-missioner of Education in the Department of the Interior, and for other purposes

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby established in the office of the Commissioner of Education in the Department of the Interior a bureau to be known as the Bureau of Aviation.

SEC. 2. That a Chief of the Bureau of Aviation shall be ap-pointed by the Commissioner of Education in the Department of the Interior, and shall be subject to the general direction of the Commissioner of Education. He shall devote his time to the inves-

Commissioner of Education. He shall devote his time to the investigation of the aviation industry, and the dissemination of information for the promotion of the aviation industry.

SEC. 3. The information to be so disseminated shall have as its objectives, (1) the broadening of the reader's horizon with respect to progress made in aviation in our commercial, industrial, and social life; (2) providing outlines for suitable elementary academic background instruction for secondary schools in such subjects as in progress and aviation is progress. Many superstitions about flying must be struck down. Education is essential. Our horizon must be broadened with respect to aviation. Not only should its military value be stressed, but we should enlarge our perspective of the place of aviation in our commercial, industrial, and social life.

In line with this view, the bill before us provides for courses of instruction in the Army. There is need for it. Only last summer did our Army pilots begin to receive instructions in training needs in a region or locality; (8) indicating procedure for the improvement of aviation personnel by conference methods.

Sec. 4. For the purpose of enabling the Commissioner of Education in the Department of the Interior and the Chief of the Bureau of Aviation to carry out the purposes of this act, the Commissioner of Education is hereby authorized to transfer to the Bureau of Aviation such activities of the office of the Commissioner of Education such activities of the office of the Commissioner of Education such activities of the office of the Commissioner of Education such activities of the office of the Commissioner of Education such activities of the office of the Commissioner of Education such activities of the office of the Commissioner of Education such activities of the office of the Commissioner of Education such activities of the office of the Commissioner of Education such activities of the office of the Commissioner of Education such activities of the office of the Commissioner of Education such activities of the office of the Commissioner of Education such activities of the office of the Commissioner of Education such activities of the office of the Commissioner of Education such activities of the office of the Commissioner of Education such activities of the office of the Commissioner of Education such activities of the office of the Commissioner of Education such activities of the office of the Commissioner of Education such activities and the office of the Commissioner of Education such activities of the office of the Commissioner of Education such activities of the office of the Commissioner of Education such activities and the office of the Commissioner of Education such activities and the office of the Commissioner of Education such activities and the office of the Commissioner of Education such activities and the office of the Commissioner of Education such activities and the office of the Commissioner of Education such activities and the office of the Commissioner of Education su sioner of Education as he may designate which relate primarily to the aviation industry, and to employ such additional persons in the city of Washington and elsewhere as may be necessary and fix the compensation of the Chief of the Bureau and other employees: Provided, That no salary shall exceed the sum of $6,000 per annum.

SEC. 5. That this act shall be in full force and effect on and after July 1, 1935.

Mr. KENNEY. The idea of an aviation bureau may loom large in the minds of some. In reality, however, it will mean only a small department to take care of the work. There are men now in the office of the Commissioner of Education capable of undertaking the matters outlined in the bill. A chief and two assistants, with a stenographic corps, could handle everything. The expense of such a bureau should not exceed in the aggregate $30,000 annually. After all, there is, perhaps, no better method of promoting and perpetuating the cause of aviation than by bringing up our youth with a knowledge and appreciation of its true value to the country. Laying the groundwork by dissemination of aviation information to our public schools and organizations of young birdmen and birdwomen, we shall go far in making the United States the greatest force in aviation in the world. [Applause.]

Mr. PARKS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a few words in behalf of a vigorous nationalism. One of the distinguished Members this morning bewailed our disbursements for national defense. I am content to accept the decision of the Committee on Appropriations on that proposition. Another of the distinguished gentlemen had some question about the necessity or propriety of other wars. In effect, the gentleman cast some aspersions upon the memories of those who have died in other wars, or rather the intents and purposes for which they shed their blood. I speak today for a vigorous nationalism, one that reveres the past and can hold its own in the future in behalf of right and justice.

Mr. SISSON. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. CULKIN. I yield.
Mr. SISSON. I would like to ask my colleague from New York, for whom I have the greatest affection, if he by any chance refers to me as having cast aspersions upon any

Mr. CULKIN. I did not mean the gentleman when I said that.

Mr. SISSON. I did not understand any gentleman had cast any aspersions upon any soldier. I think the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Biermann] and myself have the greatest respect and affection for our soldiers, living and dead. We want to prevent there being more dead soldiers, more suffering, and maimed and blind soldiers.

Mr. CULKIN. I thank the gentleman for the contribution. What I contend for, Mr. Chairman, is a vigorous nationalism, not a flabby, weak, contemptible nationalism, which would permit arms to fall out of our soldiers' hands. Nationalism was never more rampant in the world than it is today. In the countries across the sea it is especially vigorous. We gave generously to preserve democracy to the world, but in vain. Whatever urge there was toward international peace has disappeared, and today the situation requires that America should be on the watch and on guard. We have a mere skeletonized force of 90,000 men in America, hardly more than an adequate police force. They are in the nature of the fire department that goes on the scene when a conflagration first starts.

I will say in response to the gentleman from New York [Mr. Sisson] that I had no intention to cast any aspersions on him, as I know him to be a patriotic, high-minded Member; but I do decry the suggestion from other sources that the history of our past is unworthy or that the sacrifices of the past in a proper case could not bear repetition. It is my belief that America should be ready. It is my belief that this skeleton force which we have should be maintained adequately and generously by the Federal Government. The propriety of the disbursements for equipment, supplies, pay, and training I am willing to leave to the members of the Committee on Appropriations who are in charge of that. I say it is no time now to modify our support of the Army, our first line of defense. Now is the time to strengthen it and give it the highest measure of technical fitness that it may be given. I speak, Mr. Chairman, for a stronger and a more adequate national defense without any flabby sentimentalism, pacifism, or misplaced confidence as to the kind of times in which we are living. [Applause.]

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CULKIN. I yield.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Can the gentleman tell the Membership how long it would take the President of the United States, in case of a sudden emergency, to reconvene this Congress and to get any number of troops or any appropriation necessary to protect the country?

Mr. CULKIN. The gentleman must know it takes time to make a soldier. Sherman once said that it took 6 months to teach a soldier how to wear his uniform and a year to make him an adequate killer. The history of past wars show that unpreparedness in men and supplies caused a great sacrifice of human life.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words.

Mr. Chairman, a great deal of time has been consumed in the discussion that we need money because there is danger of an uprising in the United States. The gentlemen who made those statements are correct. There is a danger, but I am going to tell you why that danger exists. It exists because of the unemployment in the United States. I believe our Government should spend money for self-protection, but the amount of money which is now being demanded for defense purposes in this bill is tremendous. If we would use some of this money to eradicate the slum districts in our country, we would be doing something worth while. We know it is a fact damage caused by forest fires amounts to millions of dollars annually. Why do we not use some of this money to construct reservoirs and canals to prevent forest fires and for irrigation purposes; also for the building of highways, schools, hospitals, reforestation, elimination of dangerous road crossings, purification of rivers and streams. and for other needed projects which would provide employment for the millions of our citizens who are in distress?

I wish to say, Mr. Chairman, that I think we are going a little too far when we ask the taxpayers to appropriate such a large sum of money to be used for battleships and other war implements. If we would pass a law prohibiting any one person or corporation making profits on the construction of battleships and other armaments of war, the taxpayers would be saved a considerable amount of money.

Mr. EDMISTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Gladly.

Mr. EDMISTON. For the information of the gentleman, I will state that the Committee on Military Affairs has reported out such a bill unanimously. That will relieve the situation about which the gentleman is talking. It is a bill to take the profits out of war.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Yes. There have been many bills introduced, but will those bills be passed this session of Mr. EDMISTON. I firmly believe so.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. I hope they will be.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

The pro forma amendments were withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

CITIZENS' MILITARY TRAINING RESERVE OFFICES' TRAINING CORPS

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Marcantonio: Page 57, line 20, before the period, insert: "Provided further, That none of the funds appropriated in this act shall be used for or toward the support of any compulsory military course or military training in any civil school or college or for the pay of any officer, enlisted man, or employee at any civil school or college where a military course or military training is compulsory, but nothing herein shall be construed as applying to essentially military schools or colleges."

Mr. PARKS. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment that not only is it legislation on an appropriation bill but it is forbidden by title X, section 38 (d), of the National Defense Act.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Chairman, my amendment is clearly a limitation; in fact, it is a negative limitation. The National Defense Act provides that Congress shall appropriate funds to carry on military courses in colleges and schools of this Nation. It does not state whether these courses are to be compulsory or voluntary. All my amendment does is to refuse to appropriate sums for the carrying out of certain purposes which Congress, under the National Defense Act, has authorized.

I also respectfully submit to the Chair a precedent from the Seventy-first Congress which is on all fours with this amendment. I refer to page 2261 of the Congressional Record, volume 74, of the Seventy-first Congress, third session. The amendment that was offered at that time was identical with the amendment I have just offered, word for word.

I read as follows:

Amendment: Page 55, line 25, before the period, insert "Provided further, That none of the funds appropriated in the schall be used for or toward the support of any compulsory military course or military training in any civil school or college, or for the pay of any officer, enlisted man, or employee at any civil school or college where a military course or military training is compulsory, but nothing herein shall be construed as applying to essentially military schools or colleges."

A point of order was made against the amendment.

I now read the ruling of the Chair, Mr. Tilson, of Connecticut, being Chairman of the Committee:

The Chairman. The Chair is ready to rule. The amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LaGuardia] is in the form of a negative limitation. It is assumed that it is now authorized by law to appropriate for compulsory military courses or military training in civil schools or colleges. It is also authorized by law to pay an officer, an enlisted man, or an employee at a civil school or college where military training or courses are compulsory. The Chair is unable to find any affirmative direction in this amendment. In effect, it simply refuses to appropriate for purposes which are authorized by law and for which Congress may or may not appropriate, as it may see fit. The Chair is constrained to overrule the point of order, because he is unable to find any affirmative direction or any limitation of authority of an executive officer other than a refusal to appropriate for certain purposes for which there is authority of law and for which Congress has heretofore appropriated. It does to a certain extent change a policy of the War Department, but the Chair believes that a change of policy can be made by the fallure of Congress to appropriate for an authorized object. The Chair therefore overrules the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule.

The Chair will state that the amendment unquestionably is a negative limitation and that the amendment is in exactly the same words as a former amendment offered on January 15, 1931, which was held in order by the then Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, the distinguished majority leader, the gentleman from Connecticut. Mr. Tilson.

The Chair therefore overrules the point of order.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Chairman, I did not introduce this amendment for the purpose of raising any issue as to the merits or the demerits, or as to the advantages or disadvantages of military training. Some people believe that it is beneficial; some people do not agree. That is not the issue; there is a more fundamental issue raised by my amendment; and the issue which I now raise is whether or not the freedom of choice and the liberty of the young men of this Nation are to be completely annihilated and abolished.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I yield.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Does there not now exist freedom of choice on the part of the institutions which get these appropriations?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. There does; but may I say to the gentleman that these institutions which receive these appropriations are beneficiaries of Federal funds, and the least these beneficiaries can do is to abide by the wishes and the intent of Congress, the body which gave them the funds with which to carry out this work.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Of course, we have the authority, but does not the gentleman think that the proper method is to leave it to the institutions, to the colleges, and to the universities to determine that policy themselves? They can make it voluntary or compulsory.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. In answer to the gentleman, may I say that when we passed the National Defense Act we settled once and for all that national defense is not a matter of State right and it is by no means a matter of college right. It is matter that comes entirely and solely within the jurisdiction of the United States, and the Congress alone should regulate any matter that pertains to national defense.

Mr. RAMSPECK. I do not agree with the gentleman. We have the National Guard, which is still a State institution and regulated to a very large extent by the State law.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. This is no longer a question of State rights. The National Defense Act regulates to a great extent the National Guard in every State.

Mr. RAMSPECK. They may make any regulations they want to, and Congress should not attempt to stop them from making mandatory regulations.

Mr. CULKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CULKIN. Has not the Supreme Court held in a California case that it was within the power of a college to prescribe whether or not those attending should be subject to military training?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. No. The issue raised in the Morril Act decisions was simply that in those cases colleges had changed from compulsory to voluntary, and the War Department at that time sought to interpret that change so as to refuse appropriations for the benefit of these colleges that had changed from compulsory to voluntary. The decisions of the Court set down the rule that these appropriations applied to all colleges where they had military-training courses, irrespective of whether those colleges had voluntary military training or compulsory military training.

Mrs. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I yield to the gentlewoman from California.

Mrs. KAHN. How would a rule of this kind affect those universities and colleges known as "land-grant colleges"?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. If the land-grant colleges are considered essentially military schools, this amendment, if adopted, will not affect land-grant colleges.

Mrs. KAHN. Of course, they are not considered military colleges. They are considered essentially agricultural colleges.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. In that case, if they have compulsory military training, then the amendment would affect land-grant colleges.

Mrs. KAHN. I do not know how that is going to affect these agricultural colleges. In every one of these land-grant colleges the military training was to offset the agricultural education, and they established military training because they had established the agricultural college.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. May I say that this bill, as I understand it, does not go into effect until July 1; therefore those colleges have ample opportunity to change their system from compulsory to voluntary between now and July 1 in order to protect themselves.

Mr. DONDERO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. DONDERO. If I understand the gentleman's amendment correctly, what he is attempting to do is to change the discretion from the colleges and universities to the individuals?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. What I am attempting to do is to preserve the liberty and freedom of choice of the young men of the United States. I am attempting to curtail and abolish the further appropriation of money to schools which make it compulsory for young men who are seeking a higher education to goose step through the campus and mentally goose step in the classroom, using this system to stifle liberal thought in our educational institutions.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. LAMNECK. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman withdraw his objection?
Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman to withdraw his objection?

Mr. MERRITT of New York. Mr. Chairman, I join in the request that the gentleman withdraw his objection.

Mr. LAMNECK. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the objection. The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. McFARLANE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. McFARLANE. The gentleman is making an interesting statement, but I am wondering if the gentleman can point out any compulsion that requires any of the young men he is so interested in to attend these colleges which receive the funds referred to in this bill?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I will answer the gentleman's question. That is true in theory and it is also true that a young man may go to any college he pleases if he comes from a wealthy family; but the average young man who goes to college does not choose a college because he happens to like a particular college. He chooses the college because of economic and other factors and his choice is forced upon him by the economic elements involved.

Mr. McFARLANE. Outside of the interesting statement just made, can the gentleman submit facts as a basis for his statement which would indicate that these land-grant colleges that will be the beneficiaries under this measure are cheaper in their requirements than are other colleges?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. These land-grant colleges or any other college receiving benefits receive funds only to the extent of the number of young men who are attending the military courses. In other words, the appropriation is not made for the benefit of the institution. The appropriation is made for the purpose of carrying out training in the military course for each and every young man who is in that military course.

Mr. McFARLANE. But the course is there before the student goes to that college, and if he does not like that school he does not have to attend?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. That is very nice, but it is theoretical. I submit, Mr. Chairman, if a young man goes to college and commences his studies and then we say, "If you do not like military training you do not have to stay", that is not the American manner in which to treat the young men of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. O'MALLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Is it not true that where compulsory military training is in vogue, if a student does not take it or if he is a rather poor soldier but a good student, his marks as a poor soldier are counted against him?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Yes. In many of these colleges where military training is required, he must be proficient in the eyes of the drill master in order to graduate, even though he may be the most brilliant student in that school.

Mr. COLE of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I yield.

Mr. COLE of Maryland. I want to ask the gentleman if the purpose of the gentleman's amendment is to offset the effect of the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States in the University of Maryland case?

Mr. COLE of Maryland. Does not the gentleman know that this question has been in litigation? I may say to the gentleman that I am a member of the board of regents of the University of Maryland. As I recall, the first case on the subject which went to the Supreme Court of the United States was where 2 young men, and only 2 in a student body of nearly 2,000, refused to drill. These two young men presented the first objection in a period of 5 years. The sentiment of the other students was overwhelmingly in favor of military training.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. That is not the issue involved here.

Mr. COLE of Maryland. If what I have said is not the issue involved, as the gentleman suggests, certainly it has a very direct bearing upon the issue raised on the amendment offered by the gentleman.

The case I have reference to, with which I am entirely familiar, was tried in the lower court upon mandamus proceedings instituted by the claiming students against the board of regents of the University of Maryland. The Court of Appeals of Maryland, in One hundred and sixty-fifth Maryland, page 224, sustained the right of the University of Maryland to suspend a student by reason of his refusal to take the regular prescribed course in military training, although such refusal is based on a conscientious religious opposition to war and its preparation for war. The University of Maryland, which is a land-grant college, requires military training of its students and the catalog of the university so states. The young man in question matriculated with this knowledge, and after a brief period protested the requirements of military training, filing a written statement with the president of the university setting forth his reasons, two of which were as follows:

I wish to protest against the course in military science which students at the University of Maryland are supposed to take. I object to it on the following grounds:

1. I have conscientious scruples against war or preparation for war.

2. I do not believe that the United States should prepare for war after signing the Paris Peace Pact.

The opinion of the Court of Appeals of Maryland referred to the Morrall Act and the financial aid the university received by virtue thereof. This, of course, presented the situation not alone from a State standpoint but brought directly in the proceedings the right of the university to take the action it did notwithstanding part of the expense of the university was defrayed by Federal money. The opinion discussed in such cases as United States v. Macintosh (283 U. S. 605) and Jacobson v. Massachusetts (197 U. S. 11, 29). The following language from the opinion 165 Maryland 239 is, in my judgment, most appropriate:

It may have been that Coale was to some extent opposed to war and participation in war. But upon the facts stated it is certainly now shown that this refusal to take military training was alone due to such opposition. The question arises, Was not he much less influenced by conscientious, religious scruples than by a disposition to join the society mentioned to defeat the Government in an attempt to be ready for war, if forced upon the country, by providing military training in some or all of the Federal-aided educational institutions.

The court, we think, would be going very far should it encourage this or like societies, or persons with similar views, in their interference with the constituted authorities in the management and control of colleges and universities when acting upon authority duly and lawfully conferred upon them. Or to give encouragement to such societies or persons to interfere with the Government in all lawful efforts to keep the country in a state of preparedness for war so long as the nations of the world continue to settle their disputes by means of war. A great majority of people of this country are opposed to war, but unlike those of whom we have been speaking, they recognize the necessity of being prepared for war when it comes upon us. In preparing for defense, a military training for those who may be called upon to take arms in defense of their country is a necessary incident thereto, and any effort on the part of any of the people to hinder or defeat the Government in doing so should not be countenanced by the courts so long as the Government acts in the lawful exercise of such power. lawful exercise of such power.

The student carried the case to the Supreme Court of the United States, and in a per curiam opinion, Two Hundred and

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I am not familiar with that | Ninetieth United States Reports, page 597, the appeal was dismissed and the decision of the highest court of the State of Maryland sustained for want of substantial Federal questions being presented.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I want to complete my statement, and as my time is limited I must refuse to yield further.

Mr. Chairman, in conclusion let me say that the only argument that may be advanced here is that this might cut down the number of Reserve officers.

Let me point to the committee's report at page 25, where the committee makes this statement:

The total enrollment for the current school year is 123,202, which is not widely different from former years, and yet out of that large number the graduates over the past several years have averaged about 6,200. Manifestly there is much wasted effort and money on students who should not have been enrolled in the first instance. The Army and the schools themselves should ferret out the responsible factors and take steps to correct them.

My amendment will do the correcting. A young man who is forced is not going to strive for a commission, but the young man who volunteers will accept a commission, and by adopting my amendment you will be eliminating the waste, and you will be correcting the condition that the committee has pointed out. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I fully realize that there is a strong tendency toward government by edict, a clamor for the strong man on horseback, an urge for regimentation, but despite these conditions I still believe that the American people are still a liberty-loving people, still opposed to compulsory military training, whether it be applicable to the young man in the office, in the fields, in the factory, or in every school or college in our Nation. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have 1 additional minute to answer two questions which I desire to ask him.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

Mr. POWERS. May I ask my friend and colleague two questions: First, must these colleges accept this money from the Government?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. They do not have to; no.

Mr. POWERS. If I may ask my friend and colleague another question, Must these boys attend these particular colleges that are accepting money from the Government?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I have answered that question before. The choice of colleges, theoretically, is a free choice, but when you take the balances of convenience into consideration, the choice is no longer free.

Mr. BOLTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for one further question?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Certainly.

Mr. BOLTON. As I understand the gentleman's argument, it boils down to the fact that he desires to place the choice of curriculum in the college or university in the hands of the students instead of the faculty. If the gentleman would permit the student to choose with respect to military training. he could follow that with regard to chemistry, agriculture, or any other study.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Yes; and, as a matter of fact, in our colleges today a student can choose one language instead of another-

Mr. BOLTON. But there is a specified course of instruction prescribed by every school.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. And military training has never been considered an educational factor. It has been considered a physical and psychological factor.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a statement, if I may, at this time. The committee took into full consideration this question. Being a schoolmaster myself for 25 years, I myself considered what the last speaker was talking about with reference to the students attending these colleges. I am sure, if the gentleman will go to his fireside and sit down and study the hearings and look into the matter fully, he will come to the conclusion that what the committee has Government could quickly build an army. The Officers Redone is best for all concerned.

I would like to make this further statement, Mr. Chairman: Many of the Members are in their offices now waiting to be called here, perhaps, to vote on a certain amendment. Their wives are waiting for them to go back home, because we have told them we would get through at an early hour this afternoon. I am going to ask the Members to try to cut out this field-day talk as much as possible.

Mr. LEE of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment which is offered by the gentleman from New York for the purpose of prohibiting compulsory military training in our colleges and universities.

Surely if our Government gives free education to the young men of this country, it is not unreasonable for that Government to ask of those same young men enough of their time to learn the fundamentals of military science. Our Government gives more and asks less than any government on the face of the earth, and surely while this Government is giving free education, it is not asking too much to require the young men to take military training in order that they might better serve that Government in case of a national crisis

I believe that the training received in the R. O. T. C. units in the colleges and universities of this country is in reality in the interest of peace. I have been teaching at the University of Oklahoma ever since I got out of the Army. I have had a good opportunity to observe the work of the R. O. T. C. unit there. The Government has sent to that university, as officers and military instructors, some of the finest and highest type men it has ever been my pleasure to meet.

I have seen boys come there and take military training, the result of which was training in character, training in discipline, training in manliness, training in physical hygiene, and these same young men go out of the university proud of their record in the R. O. T. C. and with the consciousness that they are better prepared for the life of a citizen and, if necessary, that of a soldier.

The compulsory military training at the University of Oklahoma has been successful. It has been a splendid thing and has worked no injustice whatever on any student.

Many students, after having taken the course, have expressed the opinion that they are glad that it was compulsory, otherwise they might have missed that fine training.

I believe that every citizen of the United States owes it to his Government to be prepared in times of national emergency to give the best he has in defense of his country. That is only a part of our obligation as a citizens of our Government.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman

Mr. LEE of Oklahoma. Certainly.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Does the gentleman believe in universal compulsory military training in the United States?

Mr. LEE of Oklahoma. That is beside the question, sir. Mr. MARCANTONIO. Does the gentleman believe that compulsory military training should be applied to all students and young men who seek a higher education?

Mr. LEE of Oklahoma. That is not the subject before us. I am speaking on the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. On that very point, I wish the gentleman would answer the question.

Mr. LEE of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I am not in favor of abolishing these R. O. T. C. units, because I am familiar with the splendid results they are achieving. As a matter of fact, it gives the United States the greatest possible military preparation with the least possible military display. In reality it is a peace measure. The young men who come out of our colleges naturally become the leaders in this country. They are men with university and college training. They are absorbed back into civilian life; they wear civilian clothes, but underneath the civilian clothes there is trained leadership that would form the nucleus around which our Government could quickly build an army. The Officers Reserve Corps gives the greatest military preparation at the lowest possible cost. Trained leadership is undoubtedly the most important part of preparation. These men do not wear uniforms after they finish their college years, but they are trained, nevertheless, and would become the officers in case of a national crisis.

I have seen, and others who have been to France have seen, the results of the lack of preparation.

Mr. Chairman, I yield to no person in my zeal for peace. I hate war with every atom and fiber of my being, but the day has not arrived when the world has come to the philosophy of peace on earth for the sake of brotherly love.

Weakness invites attack. When the Boston police struck, were the thugs of that city so honorable that they refused to plunder, simply because the people were unprotected? No; they pillaged all the more. Weakness invites attack. To make our Nation helpless is not the road to world peace, but rather to war.

Mr. Chairman, our World War program called for 25,000 American-made planes, 20,000 to be on the front by January 1918. General Pershing attested the record that not one American-made plane ever reached the front during the war. The result was that our flyers had to fly planes that we could beg, borrow, or buy from the Allies. Naturally, the Allies used their more efficient planes for their own men, and we got the more out-of-date and less efficient ones. The result was that the casualties among the American flyers were three times greater than among the Allies, not because our boys were not good pilots but because every time they took off in one of those "flaming coffins", as Colonel Mitchell called them, death rode in the cockpit with them.

Mr. Chairman, the lack of preparation is murder. I oppose this amendment because it would destroy one of the best and most unmilitary forms of preparation, that of giving the fundamentals of military science to the college men of America. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I wish to say briefly, without any heat, that I am opposed to this amendment. Speaking generally, I cannot understand how any man could object to these young men going to college of their own volition, knowing that they will have military teaching, drill, and training at that school—how anyone could object to it.

No man who served in the World War will ever forget the unpreparedness with which we went into that war. I am not saying this in criticism of those who came out of the training camps, as well as officers from the National Guard, but I am saying that not only the lives of officers were sacrificed unnecessarily but the lives of the men who served under them.

Talk about this being a militaristic government. My goodness! Anybody knows different than that, except the pacifists of the worst type. Our people would not stand for a militaristic government.

Speaking as one of the American citizens, I do believe in adequate national defense. I do believe that the young men should be properly trained to be able to defend our Government in another such emergency, which God forbid!

We have heard this same argument in this House from time to time year after year—the same things come up, and all I want to say is that in future generations I want—if a national emergency does happen—to be well and adequately prepared. [Applause.]

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Chairman, I take this opportunity to speak in opposition to this amendment.

I had the privilege of attending one of these land-grant colleges of our country, and have first-hand information of the kind and character of military training brought about by the colleges and universities who come under the provisions of the law under which this appropriation is made.

I know, and you know, that we have had very few isolated cases throughout all of the colleges where any young man in any college has ever objected to the very light and limthose institutions.

In the universities I attended we had 3 hours' training per week. Do I understand it to be the attitude before this Congress that that Old Flag shall not be protected, that the young men shall not be prepared in case of an emergency, shall not be given the opportunity they ought to have for the military training which will make us prepared in any future emergency?

ADEQUATE NATIONAL DEFENSE HAS NEVER BROUGHT US INTO WAR

Very certainly an adequate national-defense policy such as advocated by the War and Navy Departments, and approved by the administration, will not involve us in any conflict with any other nation. But I believe it can safely be said such preparedness will be our best guaranty against any such conflicts with other nations. Looking back through history we most certainly agree that our Nation has never been the aggressor nation in any conflict. Very certainly we have never found ourselves prepared when these conflicts have come. And as a result of our lack of preparedness it has cost us tremendously in loss of lives and loss of property, We have been forced to defend ourselves in all past wars badly unprepared—there is no doubt but what some of these past conflicts would have been avoided had we been adequately prepared. All will remember the world tour of the Navy during the last administration of our great Theodore Roosevelt and the great good accomplished. There is no doubt in my mind that adequate preparedness now will be the cheapest insurance we can have against another war. Preparedness has certainly never been responsible for any of our wars and it will be our best guaranty against future wars.

Certainly we had ample experience in the last conflict as to the need for preparedness and the total lack of it in many instances, as has already been mentioned.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFARLANE. I yield.

Mr. O'MALLEY. What does the gentleman consider preparedness in modern warfare? Drilling up and down the campus or learning to operate a machine gun or wear a gas mask? A legless man could function perfectly in the wars we may face in the future.

Mr. McFARLANE. I yielded for a question.

Mr. O'MALLEY. What does the gentleman consider preparedness? Taking a lot of students out and walking them up and down the campus?

Mr. McFARLANE. The close-order drill is just one of the systems of preparedness that is being used. The program is very wide. I trust the gentleman is familiar with it. If he is not, he should look into it and see how wide it is.

Mr. O'MALLEY. The gentleman has been to one of these schools where they compel them to drill.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Permit me to say to the gentleman from Wisconsin that obedience and discipline are a part of the training.

Mr. McFARLANE. Yes. Obedience and discipline are part of the training, and this training is very necessary for all young men; it means the difference between orderly action of a well-trained army as compared to a mob. I do not understand that it is the attitude of this Congress, because of the Maryland case, the California case, or some other isolated case, to dispense with military training at all these colleges. Those are isolated cases where everybody was out of step but Jim, and just because someone does not want to subject himself to the discipline of military training this training should not be taken out of all the colleges. As was stated by our Supreme Court in the Hamilton case (79 L. Ed. 159) at page 167:

Government, Federal and State, each in its own sphere, duty to the people within its jurisdiction, to preserve itself in adequate strength, to maintain peace and order, and to assure the just enforcement of law. And every citizen owes the reciprocal duty, according to his capacity, to support and defend government against all enemies.

We had ample experience in the World War of the great need for preparedness. There were thousands upon thouited amount of military training that is given to students in | sands of young men in the last war who paid the supreme sacrifice because of insufficient or improper training of themselves and their superior officers. The little training which they receive under the provisions of this bill and under the appropriation here made might save many lives in some future conflict. Who knows? The Supreme Court has spoken on this question in very clear language. I think in keeping with their decisions we ought to think well before we approve any such amendment as the one pending.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. PARKS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph, and all amendments thereto, close in 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. BIERMANN. Mr. Chairman, if we assume for military training at a college all the merit that has been ascribed to it here-and that is a tremendous assumptionthe adoption of this amendment will not make a particle of difference in preparedness. I wish to read to you what some of the authorities say about compulsory military training.

At the University of Wisconsin, a land-grant college, which made the R. O. T. C. elective in 1923, Major Wood, who first opposed abolition of compulsory training there, said:

Voluntary training has eliminated those students who have an intense hatred of drill. Our corps is better because of it.

In other words, the abolition of compulsory military training in Wisconsin has improved the Wisconsin corps. The University of Washington, Maj. F. J. DeRouen, of the R. O. T. C., said he would like-

To give every student who does not like to drill an excuse and tell them to get out. It is the university's ruling, not ours. We do not want compulsory drills.

Maj. Enoch B. Garey, former commandant of the Johns Hopkins' R. O. T. C., made this statement:

Compulsory military training is an unfortunate plan because of its unpopularity.

Major Walser, former major, Field Artillery, said:

I do not think that any military men think it is possible to make officers out of unwilling students.

Mr. Chairman, at this point I ask unanimous consent to put in the RECORD a list of some of the organizations in the United States that object to the compulsory feature of military training for our land-grant colleges.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. BIERMANN]?

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Reserving the right to object, just to interrogate the gentleman, there is not any danger of those officers who made that statement being dismissed, is there?

Mr. BIERMANN. I cannot answer that.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Well, I hope they are not.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The statement referred to is as follows:

Mr. BIERMANN. Mr. Chairman, I look upon compulsory military training at a State institution as an example of intolerance. The religion of the Seventh-day Adventist will not permit him to take military drill. The religion of the Quaker will not allow him to take military drill. I want the Seventh-day Adventists and the Quakers to have free access to our land-grant colleges.

In Iowa we spend several million dollars a year on our State university and our agricultural college and several other State institutions. I do not want it said that the Congress of the United States agrees to a system that will keep out of those colleges the Seventh-day Adventists and the Quakers.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. BIERMANN. In just a moment. If, instead of its being the Seventh-Day Adventists and the Quakers who have religious scruples, we assume it was the Methodists and the Catholics who had such scruples against taking military training, is there any chance at all that anybody would vote to give an appropriation to a college that shut out the Methodists and shut out the Catholics?

I now yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Rams-PECK].

Mr. RAMSPECK. In the State of Iowa, has not the State legislature authority to regulate that college?

Mr. BIERMANN. Yes. Mr. RAMSPECK. Is there anything in this act or in any Federal statute which requires that college to have compulsory military training?

Mr. BIERMANN. No, sir. Mr. RAMSPECK. Then why do they not settle that out there in Iowa?

Mr. BIERMANN. In answer to the gentleman, I do not want this group to be a party to compelling any boy out in Iowa to take these silly square-corner drills that they give at our State institutions.

Mr. RAMSPECK. The gentleman knows we are not compelling anyone to take compulsory military training.

Mr. O'MALLEY. We are compelling them indirectly, because this Congress is authorized to hold out a bait in the shape of money for those schools who need a little money with which to get along.

Mr. BIERMANN. Precisely.

MILITARISM IN EDUCATION ON THE INCREASE

The extension of military training in American schools and colleges since the close of the World War has been startling. Before the war 57 institutions were listed as giving military training under War Department aid; in 1932-33 the number was 399. In 1913 the War Department had 85 men on duty with such school and college military-training units; in 1933 the number was 1,658.

ELEMENTAL RIGHTS OF AMERICAN DEMOCRACY THREATENED

These far-flung military-training units in our schools and colleges are being used as propaganda channels for the military point of view. Through them a militaristic nationalism, a belief in the inevitability of war, and a skepticism as to any save military means of avoiding war are being taught. The great danger of this militarism in education is not only that it exposes students to a philosophy and viewpoint which is entirely alien to the essentials of American tradition, which has always looked with distrust upon the military caste, but also that it threatens the essentials of democratic and academic freedom at their very source. In many school and college communities our hard-won liberties, the constitutional rights of free speech, free press, and assemblage have been suppressed or restricted at the behest of, or out of deference to, the militarists who have invaded American education. Militarizing Our Youth, a pamphlet by Roswell P. Barnes, with a foreword by Prof. John Dewey, lists 10 such cases of suppression from several States, including Ohio, Pennsylvania, Nebraska, Georgia, Oklahoma, Massachusetts, and Colorado.

MILITARISM RUNS RAMPANT

The incredible intensity of the intolerant and undemocratic militarism which has made its way into our educational system, and another manifestation of the incompatibility between this militarism and the essential American liberties, has been revealed within the last 3 or 4 years by a series of cases in which students have been denied their educational opportunities in tax-supported schools and colleges because of their religious convictions against compulsory military training. In 1931-32 three high-school students, sons of Seventh-day Adventist parents, were suspended from Council Bluffs (Iowa) High School because of their unwillingness to violate their religious training and principles by enrolling in compulsory R. O. T. C. courses. In 1932-33 two students, also sincere, religious, conscientious objectors to war and training for war, were suspended from the University of Maryland because they refused to compromise their convictions by enrolling in the compulsory R. O. T. C. In 1933-34 the University of California at Los Angeles suspended two such conscientious objectors. In 1934 seven such students were suspended from Ohio State University, and one was suspended from the University of Missouri. At the present time such students are under the threat of suspension at Kansas State College. Regardless of whether or not individual Congressmen agree with the views of these religious conscientious objectors, these cases of suspension present a condition which should challenge all who are even mildly devoted to free inquiry in education and who believe in the constitutional provisions of religious freedom in America.

STUDENTS FORCED TO APPEAL TO COURTS

In three cases students, denied their education because of their religious convictions against compulsory military training, have carried their petitions to the courts. Courts in Maryland, California, and Kansas, and the United States Supreme Court have recently passed upon the issues involved in cases where conscientious objectors to compulsory military training have been suspended because of their refusal to engage in such courses. The case of Coale against University of Maryland was decided in favor of the student by Baltimore Superior Court on January 27, 1933; a judgment reversed by Maryland State Court of Appeals on June 21, 1933. An appeal from this ruling was filed with the United States Supreme Court, but it was dismissed on November 20, 1933, "for want of a substantial Federal question." The case of Hamilton and Reynolds against regents of the University of California, after a decision sustaining the University's suspension of the students given by California Supreme Court on January 8, 1934, reached the United States Supreme Court in October 1934. That Court, on December 3, 1934, affirmed the California court's ruling. At the present time a similar case involving a student suspended by Kansas State College because of his objections to compulsory military training is on appeal before Kansas Supreme Court.

ADVERSE COURT RULINGS PLACE RESPONSIBILITY UPON CONGRESS

The Maryland, California, and Kansas courts and the United States Supreme Court, in declining to overrule the suspension of these various students, have in effect said: Upon the basis of present statutes these students cannot successfully claim exemption from such military training, nor can the constitutional guaranties of religious freedom be so interpreted as to offer them protection. The courts have indicated that remedy may properly be sought by legislation.

The responsibility, therefore, for remedying the problem of compulsory military training and the practice of penalizing students opposed to the necessity of training for Reserve officerships in the Federal Military Establishment rests upon legislative authority, Federal and State. Congress, which annually votes funds for the maintenance of R. O. T. C. units in schools and colleges, is in a large measure responsible for the perpetuation of compulsory military courses in American education.

The immediate question of policy involved is this: Is it the intention of Congress in voting funds for the R. O. T. C. that students having religious, ethical, or mere educational reservations to compulsory military training should be denied their educational opportunities in schools and colleges supported by public funds? Of course, such is not the intention of Congress. But to guarantee that none of the funds appropriated in the War Department appropriation bill shall be thus misused, Congress should include in this bill a specific provision restricting R. O. T. C. funds to those institutions which maintain their military units upon an elective basis.

In adopting such an amendment Congress will do only what has been urged for many years by our most prominent educators; countless farm, labor, and peace organizations; many church denominations and religious leaders; and, in fact, a number of professional military men.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Chairman, I think this amendment to abolish compulsory military training in colleges ought to be adopted, if for no other reason than to show this country that we oppose the compulsory induction of our citizens into any military establishment in peace time. This is not Russia, this is not Germany, Italy, or a country which compels her young men to be inducted and impressed into the army at certain ages and made to goose step and go along like the dictators of those foreign countries want, causing their youth to be cogs in a militaristic machine.

The young men of this Nation should have the right to go to any college in this country that they can afford to attend and not be compelled to take military training if they do not wish to do so. It is all right to talk about the selection of a college being a free choice and base it on the argument that any young man can go to any college he desires, but that is not the fact. I had to go to a school that I could afford to attend, as do all who want education but must work their way through because they have not wealthy parents to pay their bills. I have seen some of this goose stepping. I have seen boys made to take military training who might better have devoted their time to studying scientific courses, for when another war comes along it will be a war of brains and death-dealing machines and these boys would be just as valuable in their knowledge of the sciences as the parade-ground soldiers.

It is unfair to hold out this militaristic bait of money to the colleges which need money to carry on and make as a condition for obtaining the money the compulsory institution of a system which the militarists of this country have set up as one sure way to keep themselves in jobs and a safe way to continue drawing their pay when there are not enough commissions in the Army to go around. I think we in this Congress should give notice to the American people we represent that we, too, believe that no young man who wants to acquire an education must be compelled to join a campus army as a condition of his getting into college. We are not a militaristic nation. Our people abhor and distrust the European systems of compulsion and education for war. We do not want our boys taken into the Army under compulsion, because the soldier who is conscripted against his will is bound to be a poor soldier and always will be a poor soldier and may be the cause of unneeded disaster to his fellow soldiers if he were ever called upon for active service. [Applause.]

We talk a lot about preparation for war as being the surest way to prevent war. I have no argument with the proponents of reasonable preparation, but I say that the building up of a militaristic machine, the creation of a militaristically inclined class of citizenry in this country, starting with the attempt to mold growing minds into the idea that war is inevitable and must always come, is the surest way to start a war. Every time the Army or Navy appropriation bill comes up we hear the hue and cry for the creation of an even greater Military Establishment, because we fear some unknown nation somewhere may attack us. That is the usual propaganda fostered by the controlled press and the well-financed lobbies that make their profits from the manufacture of munitions and the implements of death. Many remedies are offered for the prevention of war and none of them get anywhere except the doubtful remedy of the militarists that great preparations must be made in order to prevent armed conflict. For over 2 years I have had pending before the Judiciary Committee a constitutional amendment to provide that in the event of war no person can be conscripted for military service until and unless private industry and private wealth are likewise conscripted for service without profit.

If our good committee would report this bill out and this amendment were put to a vote of the people of the United States, I am sure it would pass by an overwhelming majority; and then, what would happen? Those who finance war propaganda, the rich saber rattlers of the press and of the international bankers, would spend their propaganda dollars to prevent wars, since there would be no profits in an armed conflict for them.

Only recently I introduced another bill, which has received some ridicule from certain portions of the press, but on which I have received hundreds of letters of congratulation. This bill provides that the collectors of internal revenue of the district in the United States in the event of war shall provide the War Department with a list of those with highest incomes, who shall be drawn for military service first in the order of their incomes before the poor and down-trodden shall be asked to offer their lives. Of course, I know that there is very little chance of this measure passing this Congress, but I shall continue to fight for it because, if it were passed, the thousands of dollars tossed into war propaganda in this country would be diverted into the channels of peace. No one loves life more than a rich old man, and he is not inclined to care much about how many wars we have if he is sure he can sit safely at home contributing a little to the Red Cross. But if he knew that war meant the giving up of his many luxuries to stand shoulder-to-shoulder with workmen from his factory in blood-spattered, water-soaked, and muddy trenches, each threat of war would find him reaching into his pocket to pay for propaganda of press and pulpit urging deliberate consideration and counsel for peace.

In the past, America's wars, with few exceptions, have been commercial wars for the enrichment of a few. If these measures which I have introduced, and which I call to the attention of this Congress, were enacted, then the lowliest one of our citizens could serve his country in a defensive war with at least the feeling that while he was shedding his blood no one at home would be making millions off his sacrifices and the price of foodstuffs, clothing, and other things that his own little family might need desperately. When we stop crying about preparedness as the only way to prevent war and start taking the profit out of war, as I proposed, we will find wars becoming fewer and farther apart in this world.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, 4 years ago, and again 3 years ago, we fought this same battle in this House. At that time the Appropriations Committee came in with the recommendation for a reduction of 2,000 officers, with the recommendation for a reduction of the enlisted personnel, with the recommendation which practically amounted to the elimination of the R. O. T. C., but in any event sharply reducing the activities thereof; and with a recommendation along the lines of the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York. This House decisively defeated every one of those recommendations on those two occasions.

The gentleman from New York, the sponsor of the amendment, talks about the freedom of one's conscience and the freedom of one's mind. He overlooks many practical considerations; he overlooks the necessary considerations for the best interests of one's country; he overlooks that there is a proper place for freedom of conscience but that there is a line of demarcation between the academic side and the practical side thereof. From the gentleman's argument one would draw the inference that colleges did not have the opportunity of making a voluntary choice as to whether or not they would participate in and collaborate with the Federal Government with reference to military training. Insofar as this particular legislation is concerned, it in no way makes it compulsory; it is voluntary, it is discretionary, and it is a reasonable provision to insert into our law.

In 1917, when we entered into the World War, this country was absolutely unprepared. In 1898, when we entered the Spanish-American War, this country was also absolutely unprepared. In the eyes of some it is very laudable for every other nation of the world to be prepared in case of war, and in the eyes of these same people it is absolutely wrong for the United States to make reasonable preparation for our own protection. I disagree with them. We see other nations of the world preparing—for what? And we are justified in making reasonable preparations in order to defend our people, our shores, and our institutions in the event of any nation or combination of nations declaring war against the United States. While it is true that the United States is 3,000 miles removed from other large nations, it is equally true that the conditions that existed 50 or 75 years ago no longer exist. Three thousand miles mean nothing in the light of the improvements of recent years. We are faced with a very practical situation; we are faced with the responsibility of reasonably providing for the defense of 125,000,000 of American people, with other nations of the world feverishly entering into a course which has as its objective, undoubtedly, war. I am not for war, but I am for the United States being prepared to defend ourselves in the event war is declared against our Nation.

I have no criticism to offer of the gentleman from New York. So far as he is concerned, he is sincere; and it would be wrong to impugn his motives. The gentleman and I honestly disagree, however, and we can honestly disagree. believe that the present law is reasonable and proper. I believe the gentleman is wrong from a practical angle in his conclusions. We are not concerned with theory when the practical side of life is inconsistent therewith. We are living in a selfish world. We cannot have disarmament, much as we might wish for it, when every other nation in the world is arming. There is a school of thought in this country which believes that the only way to prove to other nations of the world our sincerity in our desire for peace is for the United States to disarm completely. There are other forces in this country who are advocating pacifism because they are enemies of our form of government, and such a campaign is one of their methods to obtain their objective of the overthrow of government by force. The first school have nothing in common with the latter group, but they overlook practical con-

We are vested with the responsibility of saving the Nation, of protecting 125,000,000 people, and protecting our shores and our institutions. This is an internal problem. I am not criticizing any other nations in their feverish effort toward building up their navies and armies if they want to. Although I dislike to see such policies pursued, I am justified in criticizing our own country if we did not make reasonable preparation in anticipation of any hostile move that may be made toward the United States. I am selfish in that view, cold-bloodedly and honestly selfish. When I see other countries arming, I want my country to prepare to defend, if necessary, its people.

Mr. Chairman, I want the United States to be prepared in case other nations should entertain warlike dispositions toward us. Military training in our schools and colleges is a necessary and important part of our national defense, and I hope that the amendment of the gentleman from New York will be defeated. [Applause.]

Mr. KNUTE HILL. Mr. Chairman, the question raised by this amendment is whether the young men, or young women for that matter, going to a college shall be compelled to take military training or not. As has been stated by the author of the amendment, I believe it is an interference with religious freedom. The only thing that they have in the college that is not optional is military training, and yet they tell us if these young men do not want to go to that college they do not have to. If that is true with reference to military training why should not that apply to all other courses in the college? If we are going to compel them to take military training, why not compel them to take Latin? Why not compel them to take Greek? Why not tell them "If you do not like this college and its compulsory requisitions, go to some other college"?

Mr. Chairman, if this is good physical training, if it is good for the discipline of our young men attending these colleges, why not the same for the young girls in those same colleges?

Mr. McCORMACK. Does the gentleman want an answer? Mr. KNUTE HILL. No; not now.

Mr. Chairman, the question that arises is whether we are going to prepare or not. I am rather amused when Members get up here and say, "I am not for war, I am for peace", and then go on to talk about preparedness. May I ask, What are you preparing for? It is stated that you are preparing for peace, but I defy you to prove that you are not preparing for war.

If you see a man going out on Sunday morning with his golf suit on, is he going to church? No; he is going to play golf. If he goes out with a fish pole in his hand, is he going to Sunday school, or is he going out to fish? When we see our Nation and other nations preparing, I ask you, are they preparing for peace or are they preparing to go out to kill each other? A gentleman over here stated that it takes 6 months to train a man to be an adequate killer. Now, you want our colleges to take 4 years to prepare our young men to become adequate killers. I submit that a young man who has conscientious scruples against that kind of a training has the right to go to any kind of a college and demand his rights—to determine what subjects he wants to take; what courses he wants to pursue.

Mr. Chairman, I want to speak on another phase of this matter.

Mr. CULKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTE HILL. Not at this time.

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman referred to me, and I understand that it is the customary rule of courtesy to yield.

Mr. KNUTE HILL. I yield for a brief question.

Mr. CULKIN. The gentleman's theory is that the young men should permit themselves to be killed rather than use the necessary aggression?

Mr. KNUTE HILL. Not at all.

Mr. Chairman, it has been stated on this floor that we were not prepared for the World War. Is there a man on the floor of this House who will get up and justify our entry into that war? [Applause.] Not one of you. We did not have to be prepared for that war if we had not had the propaganda, and we do not have to be prepared for another war if we leave out of consideration the Hearsts and the other propagandists in this country who are trying to build up a sentiment for war.

Mr. Chairman, I, for one, will fight as long as I am in Congress against military preparedness, because I am not only going to talk against war but I am going to vote against war as long as I am here. [Applause.]

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Chairman, I do not think there will be any circumstance that could possibly arise, while I am a Member of the House, that would make me vote for a declaration of war. I am for going to the extreme to take the profits out of the hands of munition makers and out of war. However, Mr. Chairman, I think there has arisen quite a confusion in the States here with reference to preparedness, so far as concerns our agricultural colleges and their military training. I am 100 percent for this military training. The Legislature of the State of Kansas, made up of more than a majority of farmers, last week, after 2 full days' discussion, voted to sustain the board of regents to make military training compulsory. We like that kind of Americanism. We do not like the kind that refers to this training as "goose stepping"; not making reference to Members here, but in most cases in the outside world, this spirit is a half sister to the kind that refuses to salute the flag. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. FADDIS. Mr. Chairman, as a man who in his time has seen war, I appeal to you as American citizens, as fathers of families, to take the necessary steps to insure that our country will have an adequate system of national defense. Pay no attention to those who would place us in a state of weakness which would invite imposition. [Applause.] As a father of two sons, and having myself seen war in its most horrible details, I make the statement that I hope to God my sons may never have to go forth to do battle for their country; but if ever the time comes when it is necessary for them to do so, I hope to God they go forth hardened in body and in mind, trained, prepared, and equipped for participation in the hardest game the world ever saw [applause], because they will go forth into a situation that calls for the utmost that is in a man, and I want them to go forth into combat with every chance that this Nation can give them for their lives. If they perish on the battlefield, they will have perished as men have perished in the past, as brave, honest-to-God American citizens who dared to stand up and fight for their own country. I cannot conceive of a man who has not enough red blood in his veins to defend his country in war time. I cannot see the viewpoint of those who oppose national preparedness. Who can guarantee that we may not be forced to fight a war in self-defense this year or next? Who will for one moment believe that war can be averted by prayers? If such were true, there would have been no wars since womankind has learned to pray. Would these misguided individuals who demand that we do away with our Army be willing also to have us disband our local police forces? Would they advocate doing away with fire departments?

Mr. Chairman, I was a student at a land-grant college prior to the war. They may make light of the military instruction given in them. At the worst it is far superior to none. This was the Pennsylvania State College, and those who had religious scruples against receiving military instruction were excused from it. War is a horrible situation. No one realizes this more than the men who have been through one. Nevertheless, I can imagine situations far more horrible. The history of this world shows it to be but a series of invasions and supplantings of one race against another. Would it not be very unpleasant to be the supplanted? Who can estimate the heights of patriotism or self-sacrifice the citizens of a nation will rise to in defense of their native land? If the time ever comes—and it may come—when the men of this Nation must go forth to battle untrained and unprepared, the blood of countless thousands of brave and heroic men, slaughtered because they sprung to arms which were not there, will be on the heads of those idealistic fanatics who are today opposing an adequate system of national defense.

We must have reasonable preparedness, and we must have equipment for the defense of this Nation. As a man who has had experience in the Army, I want to tell you that close-order drill is the only salvation of men in battle. By the discipline instilled by close-order drill, the men are given a preparation which provides for them their only chance for their lives in battle. God knows men going into battle are entitled to all we can give them. They are given a preparation which marks the only distinction between an army and a mob. They are put in a position where they can contribute to the defense of their country and at the same time have a chance for their lives. Close-order drill, I want to tell you, is the entire foundation of any military system, and without it, no man going into battle has a chance for his life.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FADDIS. No; I cannot yield. I would scorn to live in a nation and say that I would not defend it. [Applause.] [Here the gavel fell.]

The pro forma amendments were withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Mr. Chairman, may we have the amendment read?

The Clerk read the Marcantonio amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. Dunn of Pennsylvania and Mr. Marcantonio) there were—ayes 31, noes 119.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

MILITARY SUPPLIES AND EQUIPMENT FOR SCHOOLS AND COLLEGES

For the procurement and issue as provided in section 55 (c) of the act approved June 4, 1920 (U. S. C., title 10, sec. 1180), and in section 1225, Revised Statutes, as amended, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War, to schools and colleges, other than those provided for in section 40 of the act above referred to, of such arms, tentage, and equipment, and of ammunition, targets, and target materials, including the transporting of same, and the overhauling and repair of articles issued, as the Secretary of War shall deem necessary for proper military training in said schools and colleges, $8,900.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, this bill carries the appropriation for the greatest military college in the world, which is at West Point. I rise to call the attention of the Members of the House to a situation which I feel should be corrected.

My State and your State pay the taxes that support the Army and that support our military college. Quite recently the people of my city—St. Louis—expressed the desire that either the Army or the Navy football team should come out to the Middle West to our city and play one of our university teams. If they do not get a game, at least they will get a real work-out from one of our teams. [Laughter and applause.] Seriously speaking, we have several excellent teams.

West Point is a national institution, and so is the Naval Academy, but those in charge of the academies confine their activities, so far as football is concerned, to a small area. It is true they play some of the best teams in the country, but I think the States throughout the Nation should have an opportunity to see our Army and Navy football teams in action. They should not confine their playing to Pennsylvania, New Jersey, New York, and Massachusetts. Those States alone do not support our Army. They should meet some of the teams in other parts of the country. It has been demonstrated that we have some very fine football teams in the Middle West.

I find that West Point has its schedule arranged up to and including 1938, and Annapolis has its schedule arranged up to and including 1937. It is unfair to the rest of the country for the Army and Navy to play the same teams year after year.

I want to express the hope that the Members of the House whose States have never had the opportunity of seeing either of the teams in action will get busy with the superintendents of the academies and see if we can get them to change their present policy. The superintendents say they do not want to keep the men away from school too long. Our distinguished colleague Fred Britten, when Chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee, managed to have the teams go to Chicago, and you can get to St. Louis just as fast as you can to Chicago, and I think you can get down South, where they have some mighty fine teams, just as fast as you can get to Chicago, if not faster.

This would furnish an opportunity for some of the people who pay the taxes that maintain the schools to see the teams play.

Mr. FORD of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN. I vield.

Mr. FORD of California. I would suggest that they come

Mr. COCHRAN. So far as I am concerned, all right. I do not think they would have much trouble out there, although you have a couple of good teams. [Laughter and applause.] Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN. I yield.

Mr. DONDERO. I am in sympathy with what the gentleman is saying, but are there not some good reasons why they do not want to go that far west?

Mr. COCHRAN. One of the reasons is the money involved. Another, and what they say is the main reason, is keeping the men away from their studies. I challenge that, because they can get to the Middle West and back in 2 days.

Mr. DONDERO. And also the time involved.
Mr. COCHRAN. They get about 50 percent wherever they play; and if they will come out to our city, we will give them a real game, and we will give them 85 percent, win or lose. That will be more money than they are getting right now.

Mr. DONDERO. I would like to have them come to Michigan.

Mr. COCHRAN. Fine. You, too, are entitled to a game. We want to see them play, and we are willing to make any agreement if they will come out to our State. We will even agree not to beat them bad. Our boys will score just enough to win. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. COSTELLO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman vield?

Mr. COCHRAN. I yield.
Mr. COSTELLO. Would it not be possible for the academy to transport the team by airplane and in this way conserve time? I would like to put in a bid for a game with Loyola at Los Angeles.

Mr. COCHRAN. They could use airplanes, but it might make them a little nervous, because they are not all aviators.

Better keep them on the rails. I think I express the sentiments of the House when I say Congress does not like the present arrangement. Our friends from the East, I feel, agree with us. The people in the States that have had the pleasure of seeing the teams year after year should want to see one of the teams come out to St. Louis. We are strongly in favor of the appropriation bills that maintain our Army and Navy. We have our boys at West Point and Annapolis, and we have furnished a great deal of the material that has made history for the Army and Navy teams. Both academies have as many cadets and midshipmen from other States in the Middle West, West, South, and North as the Eastern States are allowed. Even though we are a thousand miles from the sea, we want and support a strong Navy. When the Army and Navy need votes, they do not confine their efforts to Representatives from the States where they let their football teams play. Why, here today you have as chairman of the subcommittee Mr. Parks, of Arkansas, handling the Army appropriation bill, and on the other side you have as the ranking member of the committee Mr. Bolton, of Ohio. Then you have others on the subcommittee who are not from Eastern States.

Our former colleague from Kansas, William Ayers, now a member of the Federal Trade Commission, who happens to be visiting us today, for many years handled the Navy appropriation bill. I merely call this to the attention of the House to show that it is not the East alone that furnishes the friends of the Army and Navy, and I hope the superintendents of the academies will take notice.

I sincerely hope the membership of the House will give some thought to the suggestion I advance. [Applause.]

Mr. PARKS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto now close.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

CITIZENS' MILITARY TRAINING CAMPS

For furnishing, at the expense of the United States, to warrant For furnishing, at the expense of the United States, to warrant officers, enlisted men, and civilians attending training camps maintained under the provisions of section 47d of the National Defense Act of June 3, 1916, as amended (U. S. C., title 10, sec. 442), uniforms, including altering, fitting, washing, and cleaning when necessary, subsistence, or subsistence allowances and transportation, or transportation allowances, as prescribed in said section 47d, as amended; for such expenditures as are authorized by said section 47d as may be necessary for the establishment and maintenance of said camps, including recruiting and advertising therefor, and the cost of maintenance, repair, and operation of maintenance of said camps, including recruiting and advertising therefor, and the cost of maintenance, repair, and operation of passenger-carrying vehicles; for expenses incident to the use, including upkeep and depreciation costs, of supplies, equipment, and matériel furnished in accordance with law from stocks under the control of the War Department; for gymnasium and athletic supplies (not exceeding $20,000); for mileage, reimbursement of traveling expenses, or allowance in lieu thereof as authorized by law, for officers of the Regular Army and Organized Reserves, and for the travel expenses of enlisted men of the Regular Army, traveling on duty in connection with citizens' military training camps; for purchase of training manuals, including Government traveling on duty in connection with citizens' military training camps; for purchase of training manuals, including Government publications and blank forms; for medical and hospital treatment, subsistence, and transportation, in case of injury or disease contracted in line of duty, of members of the citizens' military training camps and for transportation and burial of remains of any such members who die while undergoing training or hospital treatment, as provided in the act of April 26, 1928 (U. S. Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 59, line 16, after the word "all", strike out the figures $1,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$2,600,000."

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, this item relates to citizens' military training camps established by Gen. Leonard Wood back in 1913, which furnish the only method by which the boys back in the States from which we come have the opportunity of obtaining a commission in the Organized Reserve. It is the foundation stone of the democratic plan of a citizen army.

The bill provides for training only 14,000 in the citizens' military training camps during the coming fiscal year. The amendment which I have offered would provide for the training of 37,000 young men in these camps. I wish to call the attention of members of the committee to the fact that up until about 2 years ago we did train 37,000 young men in these camps, and it furnished a splendid occupation for young boys just out of high school during the summer months.

It seems to me that it is very desirable at this time, when there is so little opportunity, if any opportunity at all, for these young men to get employment during the time they are out of school. These young men who cannot go further than the high school ought not to be turned out to search in vain for employment. I am sure if they have an opportunity of attending these camps and getting several weeks of training they will come out of the camps better able to contend with the economic problems which face our country today.

We ought to do everything in our power so that the young men of this country can get proper training for citizenship.

We heard read today from that desk the immortal words of the Father of our Country.

Washington said:

Frugal expenditures in the time of peace will prevent a larger expenditure at a later date.

He was speaking of our military organization. The very system laid down in the National Defense Act is the system advocated by Washington, a small Regular Army, an Organized Reserve, the R. O. T. C., from which you get most of the Reserve officers, as a foundation, and below that this great body of citizens who get the first principles of military training in these camps. In the time of emergency, Mr. Chairman, 87 percent of the officers in the expanded Army must come from the Organized Reserves, yet the appropriation which we make for them is only about 1.1 percent of the total for military preparedness.

I wish to say to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. BIERMANN], who asked the question. "Against what nation are we preparing?" that we are not preparing necessarily against any nation, but we are preparing against any nation which may seek to invade our shores or seek to take away from us the liberties which our forefathers won for us in the Revolu-

Mr. BIERMANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield. Mr. BIERMANN. Can the gentleman tell us the name of any nation who might come 2,000 miles across the Atlantic Ocean or 5,000 miles across the Pacific Ocean and overwhelm 444,000 men now on the active list and the trained reserves we have today?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I would say to the gentleman from Iowa that any nation that is equipped with the instruments of modern warfare could invade this country without any trouble whatsoever, and if we followed the gentleman's policy and abolished the Army and Navy, we would have 125,000,000 people with all of the billions of wealth of this country at the mercy of any nation that might attempt to invade our shores. [Applause.]

Mr. BIERMANN. But the gentleman will not name any nation, will he?

Mr. RAMSPECK. No. I do not want to involve any nation in this particular discussion, but the gentleman knows they can come here.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. PARKS. Mr. Chairman, I understand there are one or two who would like 5 minutes, and I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Has all the time been allotted? Mr. PARKS. No; it has not. The gentleman will get recognition from the Chair.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I would like 2 or 3 minutes. Otherwise I would object.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, preparedness against war has been stressed. I want to emphasize just one phase of the training camps. I have seen thousands of boys from all over the country in these camps. I visited the training camps in the West. I have one in my own district. There are four in New England. I know those camps. I want to speak of what those camps do for the boys' character. I want to speak of what those camps do in making them good citizens. I want to tell you what the mothers of those boys have told me. In the beginning some of the mothers wondered whether they wanted their boys to go to the citizens' military training camps or not. When they came back they were extremely grateful that their boys had had the discipline of the citizens' military training camps. The boys are taught that no task is too menial, that every task accomplished is a contribution of real service and possibly a great service. When these young men return home they want to help their families. They want to help others.

Recently two boys came to my office; they had been refused admission to Annapolis on account of eye disabilities. They and their families were extremely bitter. They were bitter against me; bitter against the Navy. They felt that the Government owed them a living. Later I saw those boys in the citizens' military training camp at Fort McKinley in Maine. They said to me that they were wrong. They said, "We know now we were not physically fit to go into the Navy, but we want to serve our country; we want to become good citizens. How can we help?"

To me one of the great benefits of these camps is that the rich boy, the boy who has no means, and the boy who makes a sacrifice to go to camp, all serve together. The rich boy is treated no better than the poor boy; all have the same discipline; all have the same privileges. They are united in giving service to their country and in mutual helpfulness. The citizens' military training camp is one of the greatest things in character building and in citizenship that we have in these great United States of ours. Both character building and citizenship are safeguards against crime. I also believe in the military training part of it—not for war but against war. I am 100 percent for good citizenship. These camps teach it. [Applause.]

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I have always been very much interested in this special provision in the National Defense Act, perhaps primarily because the original camp was at Plattsburg, in my district, and ever since it was established it has been one of the most successful camps in the entire country. I have followed the work of that camp very carefully each year. I want to emphasize what the lady from Massachusetts [Mrs. Rogers] has said, and that is that the most important part of its work is real character building. There is a great deal done in these camps aside from giving military training. There are many of the boys who go to these camps who have no idea of responsibility or of government itself. At these camps they are taught the fundamentals of good citizenship as well as military training and the things they ought to know to become good citizens. If there ever was a time in our history when we needed to inculcate those views in the minds of young men, I believe it is at the present time. I believe this money is well spent, and I shall vote for the increased appropriation. [Applause.]

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I think we all recognize that a discussion of war and preparedness at this time is academic, because unquestionably this bill will go through practically as it is written; but I could not let the opportunity pass without saying a few words in explanation of my attitude toward this bill as a result of very deep and long-held convictions.

The eloquent gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Mc-CORMACK] a few moments ago said that they had this fight on the floor 4 years ago, that they had it 3 years ago, and that they had it again 2 years ago. Two or three weeks ago I made some remarks on the bond bill in which I went back about 40 years in a review of national-debt history. That was a little bit ancient for a lot of the Members of this House. I am not going back quite so far at the present moment, but as I listened to this debate my mind did go back to a debate on this floor in the Sixty-second Congress. At that time a naval bill was under consideration which made some provision for additional naval strength; and the same fight was made against that bill that is being made against this bill. They said: "For what nation are you preparing for war?" They said: "What do you want of a Navy? This country is never going to have another war; why should we squander the money of the taxpayers of the country to build up a great navy?" Those statements, Mr. Chairman, were made in a body which at that time numbered among its Members veterans of two wars, the Civil War and the Spanish-American War; and back of them there was a history of 5,000 years of war. Yet men supposedly with sufficient intelligence to be sent to Congress to represent the American people in a body constituted as was that Congress, stood on the floor of the House and opposed a provision for an increased navy on the ground that we would never have another war. That was just 6 years before the World War.

I recall another incident in connection with that debate. I was for preparedness; my idea of preparedness was a big Navy. I stood right back there in that aisle 25 years ago and said that we did not need an army in this country. I said: "We will never seek to invade any other country; no other country will ever dare to invade this country; therefore I am not for land preparation, but I am for the utmost preparation on the water."

Within 6 years from the day I made that statement on this floor we had 2,000,000 men in France and 2,000,000 more men in this country in process of preparation; and I am one of those who thinks that if we had not sent those 2,000,000 men to France we would have had, at a later day, after Germany had beaten the Allies to the ground, to send the same number of men to South America and meet Germany there.

Some of these days I am going to answer a statement I have heard cheered here—it was made on the floor this afternoon—I have heard it made a hundred times, but I have never heard it made without resenting it to the bottom of my heart: That the war of 1917 and 1918 for this country was an unjust war. I resent that statement. I say that history will falsify that statement. I do not believe the soldiers of this country ever fought in a more just or necessary war than that of 1917 and 1918. They played a dominant role in the greatest war in the history of the world. It was not a war to make the world safe for democracy; it was a war to make the world safe for the United States. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 additional minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. The name of Gen. Leonard Wood was mentioned by the gentleman who just preceded me. It recalled an instance in 1916 when Gen. Leonard Wood was making a speech in the city of Boston in favor of preparedness, at which time a heckler in the audience asked him: "General, for what war do you want us to prepare?" It was the same kind of a question that has been asked here today. General Wood said: "If you will tell me for what storm the captain trims his ship when he leaves port, I will tell you now for what war this country should prepare." [Applause.]

The point I want to bring out is the blindness and shortsightedness of the type of question that was asked Gen. Leonard Wood less than 1 year before our declaration of war against Germany and our precipitation into the World War.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I object. Time for debate on this paragraph has been fixed.

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time for debate on this paragraph be extended an additional 5 minutes and that the gentleman from Colorado be allowed to proceed for 5 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oregon?

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. PARKS. Mr. Chairman, I regret very much that the gentleman from Colorado was unable to secure additional time, for he was making a most interesting statement. I was constrained to object to the extension because the time for debate on this paragraph has been previously limited, and only 4 minutes now remain for debate on the pending amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I am forced to object to the attempt to increase the number of C. M. T. C. traineess to 37,000 and to increase the appropriation by $1,600,000. No one has a higher regard than I for these young men, and no one would go further than I to build up the character of these men; but we are the guardians of the money of the people of the United States. From one end of this land to the other the membership of this House has been denounced for undertaking to build up the kind of an Army we ought to have.

You have already added $5,000,000 to this military budget, and I appeal to you not to go further and take $1,500,000 additional of the people's money, even though it be for training a larger number of these splendid young men. We have provided generously for the R. O. T. C. We carry in this bill $1,000,000 for 14,000 C. M. T. C. trainees. We are going to add thousands upon thousands of dollars for the C. C. C. camps throughout the United States doing a similar work. I should be delighted to join the gentlemen offering the amendment, because there is not a thing in the world wrong with the amendment, except it digs down into the pockets of the people of the United States when they cannot afford to spend the money.

Mr. POWERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKS. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey. Mr. POWERS. The War Department, if I understand correctly, asked the Budget for $1,000,000 to cover this item.

Mr. PARKS. That is right.

Mr. POWERS. The individuals appearing before our committee for the citizens' military training camps also asked for $1,000,000, which is included in this bill?

Mr. PARKS. From the War Department; yes. Mr. O'MALLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKS. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin. Mr. O'MALLEY. The gentleman mentioned the C. C. C.

The gentleman does not consider the C. C. as a military establishment?

Mr. PARKS. No, I do not; but it is a training ground for the idle young manhood of this country, and that is what this is as much as anything else; at least, that is responsible in large measure for the amendment being proposed.

Mr. Chairman, no one in an official status has asked for this money except a Member of Congress. I hope you will not follow the gentleman in this instance and appropriate this money which we can ill afford to spare at this time. The committee has provided for this activity as generously as we feel existing circumstances warrant. We have endeavored to allocate the moneys carried in the bill to those projects of greatest military importance. I do not believe that this House ought to go beyond the recommendation of the committee. Both the subcommittee and the full committee went over this measure very carefully. They found it in this respect to be in agreement with the Budget, in accord with the request of the War Department, and also in harmony with the recommendations of departmental officials who appeared before the committee. In all instances the amount asked was $1,000,000. Under these circumstances, Mr. Chairman, why should we adopt this amendment appropriating an additional $1,600,000?

The pro forma amendments were withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. Ramspeck) there were—yeas 22, noes 68.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Under the authorizations contained in this act no issues of reserve supplies or equipment shall be made where such issues would impair the reserves held by the War Department for two field armies or 1,000,000 men.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, when I had the floor a few minutes ago I was coming to one other statement made by Gen. Leonard Wood in his speech at Boston. He at that time said that this country had never been prepared for war but once. Mind you, Mr. Chairman, this speech was made in 1916. He stated that this country never had been prepared for war but once in its history, and that was at the close of the Civil War. In other words, at the close of the Civil War the United States had finally gotten prepared for war. That statement is just as true now as when Leonard Wood made it, although we have participated since then for 2 years in the greatest war in the history of the world. We were not prepared for that war, even when we got through with it.

Mr. FADDIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. FADDIS. It might be pertinent to tell the House what our preparedness for war at the end of the Civil War saved us at that time.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Well, it saved us down there in Mexico. When France got a hint to get out of Mexico she got out, and she got out because the United States was prepared to expedite her exit if she did not go.

Mr. Chairman, during the World War I was at Camp Kearny, and the thing that dumfounded me most during that time was reading statements in the papers made by Newton D. Baker, then the brilliant Secretary of War, before a committee of the United States Senate, wherein he told that committee how well and thoroughly prepared all of the Army divisions and encampments were, when every man in those encampments knew to the contrary.

I was a member of a division that never had a thing but its uniforms, and it went to France without a thing; after we were there for a year we were without equipment except the uniform on our backs. That is the way most of the 2,000,000 men went to France. They went without training, without equipment, and fought over there with the equipment of the Allies. They never had a combat plane or a piece of artillery. That is the reason I make the statement that even at the end of the World War we were not prepared for war.

May I say further that I am not a militarist and I am not a "jingo", and while I did muss around with a uniform on for a year and could not get to France there is nothing military about me. You could not make the American people militaristic in a hundred years. It is just not in them. They have not a military consciousness or tradition. As soon as a war is over they take off their uniforms, throw them away, throw their guns away, and go back to civil pursuits, forgetting about war and Army life. So there is no danger at all that by making these reasonable contributions to the national defense we are building up a military system in this country and making America a militaristic nation.

May I say that my formula for the national defense is very simple. It is based on a long life of observation and reflection. My formula for the national defense is just to be so ready that the other fellow cannot start. [Applause.]

I do not know whether I will live to see it, and I am sorry to say it, but I feel just as sure as I am standing on this floor looking into your faces that the day is again coming when this country will have to be just that ready. I think every Army officer in the service of the United States recognizes that eventuality on the horizon. He hopes and prays in his heart it may never come, but he feels that it will, and when it does come he wants to be prepared and he wants his country to be prepared so as to avoid the sacrifice and slaughter and blunders that characterized our participation in the World War in France.

It is for these reasons that I am in favor of the moderate increases carried in this bill providing for the addition of 5,000 men in the Federalized National Guard and an authorization to the President to increase the enlisted personnel of the Regular Army from 118,750 to 165,000; increasing the number of trainees in the Reserve officers from 16,000 to 20,000 annually, and an increase of camp duration from 28 to 42 days in the Reserve Officers' Training Corps; also the preserving the 30-day C. M. T. C. camps for 14,000 boys. There is no finer body of men in the country than the men who are sacrificing their time and interests in the Officers' Reserve, and while I am opposed to compulsory training and consider it a mistaken policy, I wish that every boy might get the benefit of the training received in the citizens' military training camps. I look upon these activities not only without fear but with approval.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I will.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman think the soldiers who were in France and were disabled forgot about the war, especially those who today are not receiving adequate compensation from the Government?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I do not know that I just get the gentleman's question. There is nothing I would not do for the disabled veterans of the World War. I am not defending war. I wish there might never be another war in the history of the world, but I am not so foolish as to think there will not be one, and I want to be prepared against any such eventuality. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BIERMANN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, it seems remarkable to me that this Democratic Congress can be so tangled up on the facts regarding the World War.

I called attention the other day to the fact that it is now orthodox procedure on this side to rise and villify one of the greatest men who was ever President of the United States, Woodrow Wilson. [Applause.] You see, I do not get very much applause. If I had said something against him I would have received a big hand. [Cries of "No, no."]

It is customary here to say that the big bankers got us into that war, when 373 Members of the Congress voted for the war, including some of the most illustrious men now in this body on both sides, and only 50 voted against it.

We have come to think that the international bankers pulled the wool over the eyes of the President of the United States and over the eyes of 373 Members of this body.

I now want to refer to something else. They say we were entirely unprepared when we went into the World War. This is fine stuff to ring the changes on and to harp on; and then they say we did not get ammunition or equipment over on the other side.

How short is the memory of the Members of this Congress? Their memory certainly ought to go back to 1917 or 1918; and if it does, they will recall that the Allies, who ought to have known something about what was going on over there, did not want us to send any planes over there; did not want us to send any artillery or any ammunition or any rifles over there. They had all that kind of stuff and they begged us to send food and supplies. When General Joffre was on his first mission to this country he asked us not to send anything but foodstuffs. Later on, they wanted men, but never, at any time during the 19 months, did the Allies ask us to send airplanes or equipment to the other side.

Let us keep somewhere near the facts in discussing the World War and keep somewhere near the facts when we use this as an illustration of what we ought to have now in these appropriations.

The Clerk read as follows:

No part of the appropriations made in this act shall be available for the salary or pay of any officer, manager, superintendent, foreman, or other person having charge of the work of any employee of the United States Government while making or causing to be made with a stop watch, or other time-measuring device, a time study of any job of any such employee between the starting and completion thereof, or of the movements of any such employee while engaged upon such work; nor shall any part of the appropriations made in this act be available to pay any premiums or bonus or cash reward to any employee in addition to his regular wages, except for suggestions resulting in improvements or economy in the operation of any Government plant.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the Committee, we have had some enlightening discussion on this great question, which has been here regularly every 2 years. The question now seems to present itself in this form—that there must not only be adequate protection but still more adequate protection.

I was wondering what had become of the added Reserve officers. I voted for them when originally provided for.

These Reserve officers are men who have been enlisted for the next war, if we have one. Then in addition to that, we have the nationalizing of the State guard, which means nothing more nor less than that the entire National Guard is subject to the authorities in Washington, all of which adds to our previous military strength.

I am for ample preparedness, and my friends, that is due to the past experiences of our country. We all know what happened, due to our lack of preparedness, in the War of 1812, at Bladensburg, in Washington, and Erie.

When the Spanish-American War was declared there was a lamentable lack of preparedness, and the great loss we experienced by not having it was the result.

We had to blush again at the opening of the World War because of that same lack of preparedness.

Now, I want to know if you expend these untold millions for preparedness you are going to impose such conditions as we had during the World War, when they spent hundreds of millions for munitions that never saw a battlefield. Within a few miles of my home they spent millions for shells that never got to Europe.

Again we blushed with shame when they tore down the giant pines of the great Northwest and not a single stick of that timber ever got into an airplane.

We want to prepare against that; that is the preparation I want to see. After you make provision in this appropriation and you are ready to put up as a sacrifice the blood of our sons, then see that they get a fair chance with the trained soldiers of other nations, if it is to be a war of resistance or otherwise.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOCHT. I yield.

Mr. BULWINKLE. I may state to the gentleman thatif the gentleman, who was in Congress, will recall—the high command of the Allies could not tell how long the war was going to last. We had to be prepared for a year or 2 years beyond the time of the armistice. That is the reason why some of the gentleman's shells did not get to France, unless they were rejected.

Mr. FOCHT. Oh, yes; rejected! They did not reject our young men when they said, "The Yanks are coming." They took them over there when they were unprepared. They took them into the camps of England and gave them 2 weeks' training and sent them against the greatest trained troops of the world; yet the Yankee boys made good, with all the deficiency here. I do not want such deficiency again if I am to vote for this bill. I want you leaders on the Democratic side who control the situation to see that these hundreds of millions appropriated for preparedness accomplish the purpose of preparation, with the elimination of the plus-10-percent contracts.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words, and I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed out of order, but upon a subject having connection with this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether the other Members of Congress have had the same experience I have had or not in relation to the admission of boys to West Point and Annapolis. I have found it quite difficult for the young men to qualify, both mentally and physically, to pass the rigid examination. I think one reason why it is difficult to qualify mentally is that the young men do not get information about our great service schools which they do about colleges.

In looking up this matter I found that schools in my district had no information whatever about either academy, but any principal of a high school or of a private school could give the young man all the information he wanted about any college. I realize, of course, that there is great demand for these appointments. Nevertheless, in order to of the test is concerned, but the rigid standards that our schools rightly have, the young man must begin early to get the necessary training. In order to get that training he must naturally have information about the schools. I realize further that the principals of our schools usually are college men. They are proud of the institutions from which they may have graduated.

Therefore, when those young men go to them for information and advice as to where to continue their training they are very prone to recommend the institutions from which they themselves may have graduated. None of these instructors has graduated from West Point or Annapolis in all probability. Consequently the attention of the young man is not directed to our service schools. I want to offer the suggestion, Mr. Chairman, that the committees in charge of issuing the pamphlets-and I am not sure whether it is a matter in the hands of the Printing Committee or in the departments-do toward West Point and Annapolis exactly the same as is done by the colleges themselves, namely, to place in the hands of instructors and principals of schools and academies throughout the country pamphlets of information such as we provide them with when they send to us. The expense would be practically nothing and it would give our young men a chance to know about these wonderful educational opportunities. I offer that as a suggestion only, in no sense as a criticism.

Mr. McMILLAN. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. TREADWAY. I yield. Mr. McMILLAN. The gentleman is aware that those pamphlets are issued by the War Department and the Navy Department, showing the regulations governing admission of cadets.

Mr. TREADWAY. They are issued, of course, in large quantities, and they are available to the gentleman and to myself; but the boy back home must send to us in order to get them. Probably they could apply for them direct, but what I would like to see is that those institutions be placed on a parity for information with the colleges to which the boys may be likely to go, by having available in the libraries of the schools these pamphlets.

Mr. OLIVER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield.

Mr. OLIVER. If the Members of Congress would only request the departments to send this information to such schools in their districts as they felt would be interested, it would be done. So that the information which the gentleman wants made available can be made available on the request of Members of Congress.

Mr. TREADWAY. I think that of itself is a good point, and if I have done nothing else in this 5 minutes I have called the attention of my colleagues to the fact that it is desirable to do it. I think the information should be in the hands of the school authorities. I am sure the gentleman from Alabama agrees with me on that.

Mr. OLIVER. I do. Mrs. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I gladly yield to the lady.

Mrs. KAHN. I suggest to the gentleman from Massachusetts that he do what I have done and what others have done; that is, to furnish his high schools with copies of the requirements for both West Point and Annapolis. The boys can always get information in their schools about it.

Mr. TREADWAY. That is the way I think it should be done throughout the country, that we should all see that the institutions are provided with that information, to have it available for the boys.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. TREADWAY. I yield. Mr. RANDOLPH. Is it not further the fact that in high schools of the country generally, those young men are not grounded particularly in mathematics, a subject which they need?

Mr. TREADWAY. The gentleman is correct, although I think our high schools could provide for that need if requested. As an illustration of that very fact, there was a pass a difficult mental test, not difficult as far as the amount | young man from my district graduated from Annapolis last spring. I asked him what his background was before he was appointed to Annapolis. He said he had gone to an instructor when he was in grammar school and asked him to advise him and direct his course toward admission to Annapolis at the proper time. The boys do not start soon enough to qualify for these examinations.

Mr. RANDOLPH. May I add further in this connection that one of the candidates for the Naval Academy from my district, whom I appointed, after 6 months in the Naval Academy, was unable to pass the mid-year examination because of lack of fundamental mathematics. The large number of high schools are trying to become young colleges, and are forgetting fundamental subjects and allowing graduation of students who take almost all elective work.

Mr. TREADWAY. There is no question about the correctness of the gentleman's statement. All I am urging is that our service schools be brought to the attention of young men early in their school courses so that they may have suitable preparation for admission.

Mr. PARKS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words, and I do so only for the purpose of making a statement. This completes the military items in this bill. The 10 or 12 pages remaining relate to nonmilitary items. There are many Members who will be called out of the city tonight, for there is expected to be no session of the House tomorrow, and there are two committees now in session, the members of which will probably have to be called out to respond to a roll call. We are very anxious, indeed, to complete this bill this afternoon. I do not believe there is any further controversial item in the bill. So I hope consideration of the bill may be expedited.

By unanimous consent, the pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

For maintaining and improving national cemeteries, including fuel for and pay of superintendents and the superintendent at Mexico City, laborers and other employees, purchase of tools and materials; purchase, including exchange, of one motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicle; and for the repair, maintenance, and operation of motor vehicles; care and maintenance of the Arlington Memorial Amphitheater, chapel, and grounds in the Arlington National Cemetery; for repair to roadways but not to more than a single approach road to any national cemetery constructed under special act of Congress; for headstones for unmarked graves of soldiers, sailors, and marines under the acts approved March 3, 1873 (U. S. C., title 24, sec. 279), February 3, 1879 (U. S. C., title 24, sec. 280), March 9, 1906 (34 Stat., p. 56), March 14, 1914 (38 Stat., p. 768), and February 26, 1929 (U. S. C., Supp. VII, title 24, sec. 280a), and civilians interred in post cemeteries; for recovery of bodies and disposition of remains of military personnel and civilian employees of the Army under act approved March 9, 1928 (U. S. C., Supp. VII, title 10, sec. 916); for the care, protection, and maintenance of the Confederate Mound in Oakwood Cemetery at Chicago, the Confederate Stockade Cemetery at Johnstons Island, the Confederate burial plats owned by the United States in Confederate Cemetery at North Alton, the Confederate Cemetery, Camp Chase, at Columbus, the Confederate Stockade Temetery at Point Lookout, and the Confederate Cemetery at Rock Island, $677,607: Provided, That no railroad shall be permitted upon any right-of-way which may have been acquired by the United States leading to a national cemetery, or to encroach upon any roads or walks constructed thereon and maintained by the United States within the corporate limits of any city, town, or village.

Committee amendment:

Page 62, line 19, after the figures "56" and before the comma, insert a parenthesis.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Flood control, Mississippi River and tributaries: For prosecuting work of flood control in accordance with the provisions of the Flood Control Act, approved May 15, 1928 (U. S. C., Supp. VII, title 33, sec. 702a), and for the purchase of motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles and motor boats, for official use, not to exceed $45,750, $15,000,000.

Mr. BIERMANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the

Mr. Chairman, as I understand from the reading of this section, it relates to flood control of the Mississippi and its tributaries.

Mr. PARKS. Yes.

Mr. BIERMANN. Just in order to make the RECORD clear, I ask the chairman of the subcommittee whether or not any of this money is to go for the construction of locks or dams for the 9-foot channel of the Mississippi?

Mr. PARKS. No; it has not been authorized. This all goes for flood control.

The Clerk read as follows:

Sec. 3. No part of any appropriation made by this act shall be used in any way to pay any expense in connection with the conduct, operation, or management of any post exchange, branch exchange, or subexchange within any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, save and except for real assistance and convenience to military personnel and civilians employed or serving at military posts in supplying them with articles of ordinary use, wear, and consumption not furnished by the Government.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment. The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Hoeppel: After the word "posts", in line 7, on page 72, insert "and to retired enlisted personnel."

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment—

Mr. PARKS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. HOEPPEL. I yield.

Mr. PARKS. While I think this amendment is subject to a point of order, I shall not make one. The reason I do not agree to the gentleman's amendment—and I am not opposing it—is because about 2 years ago the House had a rather extensive hearing by a committee that went about from post to post and then brought back a report that recommended limiting the sale of articles in the posts to the people who lived at the posts. For that reason, which seems to me good and sufficient, I should not be willing to agree to the amendment, but I am not disposed to deprive the committee of an opportunity to pass upon this proposition.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment in order to extend the facilities and privileges of Army post exchanges to the retired enlisted personnel of the Navy and Marine Corps. The retired enlisted men of the Army are authorized to purchase at Navy post exchanges; therefore, the adoption of this amendment would extend reciprocal consideration to the retired enlisted men of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps.

It seems to me it is only fair and square that we should give the retired enlisted men of the Navy equal consideration with the Army retired personnel in this respect. I wish to call the attention of the Members to the fact that almost 5,000 men who were transferred to the Naval and Marine Corps Reserve after 16 and 20 years' service receive less than $50 per month retainer or retired pay. As I mentioned on the floor several days ago, the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretaries of other departments are discriminating against these men and discharging them from Government employ here in Washington merely because they are receiving retired pay, notwithstanding that many of them are entitled to disability preference. I feel that we owe it to these men in their declining years to extend them this opportunity to augment, in a sense, their purchasing power. They would save anywhere from 5 to 10 percent on purchases made at Army post exchanges if this amendment is adopted.

In order that the Members may know the character of service given by these men, I shall read an excerpt from a letter received from one of these enlisted men:

I enlisted in the Navy in March 1898 in the lowest grade; served a year or so around Cuba, 9 months without getting ashore. You know what kind of food we got; and the decks were often used as our feather beds. Only 50 cents a day was our pay. Youngsters today who enter civil service receive about 65 cents per hour.

This man said he served ashore with the expeditionary forces in Central America and in the West Indian section for a period of 4 years. This shipmate had 15 years' actual sea service. If this amendment is adopted, enlisted men transferred to the Fleet Naval Reserve and retired enlisted men of the Navy who are from 50 to 70 or more years of age will be permitted to purchase limited and necessary supplies at Army post exchanges and thus will be in a position, in a sense, to combat the increasing cost of living. No additional expense to the Government is involved. Instead it will add | to the revenues and profits of the post exchanges through increased sales. As the profits of the post exchanges are used primarily for the purchase of athletic equipment and for the general welfare of Army enlisted men, including improvements in their mess, the adoption of this amendment will be of joint benefit to both the retired enlisted men of the Navy and Marine Corps and enlisted men in active service in the Army.

Notwithstanding that objection has been made to the amendment by the chairman of our committee, I am convinced that he and the members of the subcommittee are, in a sense, favorably disposed and that if this question had been left entirely to their decision, without the background of opposition to which the chairman has referred, this amendment would have been adopted in the committee.

At this time I wish to compliment the chairman and the members of the subcommittee on their very able presentation and the just and fair consideration they have extended to me in this and other proposals which I have submitted to them for their consideration in the committee hearings.

Referring again to the amendment, I feel that we should consider the plight of the low-paid retired enlisted man of the Navy and Marine Corps and that this amendment which I have offered, extending to them the privilege of purchase at Army post exchanges, should be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PARKS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all Members who have spoken on this bill may be permitted to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. PARKS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include a statement with reference to an article in the newspaper yesterday referring to the amendment adopted at that time.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. PARKS. Mr. Chairman, I feel that I should take a few minutes to correct some misinformation that appears this morning in the Washington Post, and most likely other papers throughout the country, as the article to which I have reference is attributed to the usually accurate Associated Press.

I appreciate the fact that it must be difficult, if not wellnigh impossible at times, to hear in the galleries what is said upon the floor, because we on the floor have difficulty ourselves in hearing at times.

The article I refer to is headed "Boost in Army to 165,000 Men Voted by House." Then it proceeds to say:

The House yesterday voted to increase the strength of the Army from 118,750 to 165,000 men.

Originally, the provision in the $370,000,000 War Department appropriation bill left it to President Roosevelt's discretion whether to make the increase. But make the hoist mandatory. But 97 to 66, the House voted yesterday to

Of course, that is just the reverse of what occurred. The bill the committee reported authorized the President, at his discretion, to increase the enlisted strength of the Army from 118,750 to 165,000 men, and made available the funds requisite for so doing. The amendment adopted yesterday provides that the President, at his discretion, may increase the enlisted strength of the Army from 118,750 men to 130,321 men, and not to 165,000 men, as proposed by the committee. The amendment also makes a straight-out appropriation to pay for the lesser increase. If the President should decide not to make the increase, then under the amendment adopted we have added over $5,000,000 to the Budget unnecessarily. The actual net result of the amendment is to limit the President's discretion. He may only increase the Army by 11,571 men, instead of by 46,250, which he would be permitted to do under the bill as reported by your committee. There was nothing mandatory about from Iowa.

the committee's provision and there is nothing mandatory about the amendment which was adopted on vesterday.

I hope I have made the matter clear and that our newspaper friends will correct the misinformation given to the public this morning.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, we have just heard read, section by section, the appropriation bill for the War Department.

The hearings on this bill were conducted by one of our colleagues, the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. PARKS], who has never had any experience heretofore in managing an appropriation bill before the House. This bill was drafted under his direction, it was brought into the House under his direction, and conducted so far through the House under his direction. I want to take my hat off to him in his magnificent management of this bill and to say for him, as chairman of this subcommittee, he is one of the best chairmen that committee has ever had. [Applause.]

Mr. PARKS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. Hill of Alabama, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 5913, the War Department appropriation bill, 1936, had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. PARKS. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments thereto to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

Mr. PARKS. Mr. Speaker, I demand a separate vote on the so-called "Thomason amendment."

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any other amendment? If not, the Chair will put the other amendments en gros.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Thomason amendment may be again read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection?

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Thomason: On page 10, line '14, beginning with the word "together", strike out all matter down through the word "men" in line 21 and insert in lieu thereof the following: "together with the additional sum of $5,005,748 to be available under this and other appropriations contained in this act for defraying the cost of increasing the enlisted strength of the Regular Army from an average of 118,250 to an average of 130,321 enlisted men."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Thomason].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. Thomason) there were—ayes 62, noes 94.

So the amendment was rejected.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. BIERMANN. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill? Mr. BIERMANN. I am.

The SPEAKER. Is there any member of the committee opposed to the bill who desires to offer a motion to recommit? If not, the Clerk will report the motion of the gentleman The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BIERMANN moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on Appropriations with instructions to make such changes as effect a reduction of 20 percent in the total appropriation.

Mr. PARKS. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to re-

The motion to recommit was rejected.

Mr. BIERMANN. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Eighteen Members have risen. Not a sufficient number, and the yeas and nays are refused.

The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and the bill was passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

CONFERENCE REPORT AND STATEMENT (S. 1190)

Mr. COLE of Maryland submitted a conference report on the bill (S. 1190) to regulate interstate and foreign commerce in petroleum and its products by prohibiting the shipment in such commerce of petroleum and its products produced in violation of State law, and for other purposes.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 1190) to regulate interstate and foreign commerce in petroleum and its products by prohibiting the shipment in such commerce of petroleum and its products produced in violation of State law, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:
In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the amendment of the House insert the following:
"That it is hereby declared to be the policy of Congress to protect interstate and foreign commerce from the diversion and obstruction of, and the burden and harmful effect upon, such commerce caused by contraband oil as herein defined, and to encourage the conservation of deposits of crude oil situated within the United States. United States.

STATEMENT

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing vote of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 1190) to regulate interstate and foreign commerce in petroleum and its products by prohibiting the shipment in such commerce of petroleum and its products produced in violation of State law, and for other purposes, submit the following statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conference and recommended in the accommension conference. the conferees and recommended in the accompanying conference

The House amendment struck out all of the Senate bill after the enacting clause. The Senate recedes from its disagreement to the House amendment with an amendment which is a substitute for both the Senate bill and the House amendment. The differences between the House amendment and the substitute agreed upon by the conferees are as follows:

The substitute contains a definition of "contraband oil" which in substance is the same as that contained in the House amendment, but the language agreed upon is believed to be more clear.

ment, but the language agreed upon is believed to be more clear.

The House amendment, in section 3, prohibited the shipment of contraband oil in interstate commerce, and contained a proviso authorizing the President to make determinations from time to time as to lack of parity between the supply and demand in petroleum in interstate commerce, and provided that upon the making of any such determination the prohibition against shipment in interstate commerce would be suspended. This provision is retained in the substitute except that the proviso is placed in a separate section, and there is added a provision expressing the intention of Congress that if the section giving the President authority to act in such situations is held invalid, the prohibition against shipment in interstate commerce is still to be in force.

Under the House amendment members of the boards which are to be established by the President were to be paid not to exceed $5,000 per annum, and employees of such boards were not to be subject to the Classification Act of 1923 as to their compensation. The substitute agreed to in conference provides that the compensation of members of such boards and their employees shall be fixed in accordance with the Classification Act of 1923.

Under the House amendment actions to compel compliance with the act or to enjoin violations thereof were to be initiated by the President or the Attorney General. The substitute modifies these provisions so that the President (or any agency, officer, or em-ployee designated by him under sec. 11) is to act through the Attorney General.

The House amendment provided that the act should not apply in the case of petroleum or petroleum products moving in interstate commerce on or before the date of the enactment of the act.

This provision is eliminated from the substitute.

The House amendment provided that the act should cease to be in effect on June 1, 1936. This date is changed to June 16, 1937.

WILLIAM P. COLE, Jr.,
SAMUEL B. PETTENGILL,
EDWARD A. KELLY,
CARL E. MAPIES,
CHARLES A. WOLVERTON,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. COLE of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the conference report.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, have we a copy of this conference report available?

Mr. COLE of Maryland. I may say to the gentleman that the conference report, to which all the conferees have agreed, has been approved by the Senate this afternoon, making a few technical changes in the bill. It is virtually as the House passed the measure last Monday.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to ask one question. Is there any provision put in the bill in conference that provides any interim between the passage of the bill and the time it shall take effect? We voted the 5-day clause out in the House.

Mr. COLE of Maryland. None whatever, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. BLANTON. Then I do not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

There was no objection.

Mr. COLE of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the statement may be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the statement.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

AUTHORITY TO SIGN ENROLLED BILL

Mr. COLE of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I offer a resolution and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration. The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 127

Resolved, That, notwithstanding the adjournment of the House, the Speaker be, and he is hereby, authorized to sign the enrolled bill of the Senate, S. 1190.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS HOUSE

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 minutes?

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Speaker, during the consideration of the War Department appropriation bill the committee was presided over, in most able fashion, by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Hill]. It occurs to me, without attempting to be a faultfinder, it might be pertinent at this time to ask Members of this body if, in the future, we cannot cooperate a little more in an attempt to maintain order in this body.

Time after time I have offended my colleagues by indulging in conversation during the proceedings in this Chamber. I am guilty as well as the rest of you, but if in the conduct of public business all of us would attempt to maintain decorum and order and be courteous to our colleagues and observe our duty to our people and show proper courtesy to the mace and the presiding officer in the committee and courtesy to the Speaker who is presiding in the House, I think it would be for our own welfare and, certainly, a courtesy to the one who is speaking, as well as the one who is presiding in this body. [Applause.]

ABRAHAM LINCOLN

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I ask unanimous consent to include therein an address delivered by my colleague the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KELLER].

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered before the Loyal Legion Auxiliary annual breakfast at the Mayflower Hotel, Washington, D. C., February 12, 1935, by Representative Kent Keller, of Illinois:

If we are to understand men, we cannot separate them from the time in which they lived. If we are to appraise the service of our statesmen, we must know the condition of statecraft when of our statesmen, we must know the condition of statecraft when they first entered upon the stage of action. We cannot appreciate the liberators of mankind without knowing the source of the motives which inspired them. Liberty was not born out of the blue sky in America. It was born out of necessity like every other great development. Its roots reach deep into the past. What were the conditions when Abraham Lincoln was born? What were men thinking and doing as he grew up? What affected him most? What set him on his way? What did he achieve? What growth did he himself make? What primary thought do we gather out of his life for our own inspiration? With these questions in mind let us pass with all too great rapidity over the life tions in mind let us pass with all too great rapidity over the life of the man who came into the world 125 years ago today. In doing this it is my object to present a viewpoint as far from the beaten path as possible, at the same time remain true to the best idea of our Lincoln.

At the birth of Abraham Lincoln we were still living within the shadow of the English common law, that acceptance of the bind-shadow of the English common law, that acceptance of the binding power of past customs.

At that time to ask, however peacefully and meekly, for an increase of wages or to organize a union of laborers to improve their economic condition under that common law was an act of conspiracy. It was so enforced, often with great brutality, in England until the men of England extorted from the British Parliament the right to vote only after our own Civil War. Under that same common law the employers of labor had a special law for themselves which specifically gave them the power to combine in their own interest and to dictate the wages and hours of work for the men who labored for them. for the men who labored for them.

It was the era of the tremendous expansion of the use of laboraving machinery in England with the terrible abuse of humanity for the sake of profit. We were growing out of the age-old poverty of production into the intenser poverty of maldistribution of wealth. The discovery of the economy of plenty lay far out ahead

Under that law children 9, 8, 7, 6, even 5 years old filled the factories of England, and worked the brutal 12 hours a day excluding the half-hour for lunch. English and Scotch women were still yoked to the coal cars in the low-seam mines, and on their hands and knees dragged the coal to the hoisting shafts when Abe Lincoln was a member of the Illinois Legislature. Out of such brutality and starvation wages was coined the largest fortune of those times.

And when for any cause, whether war or famine abroad, work slackened in the British factories, the exploiters of the helpless workers of England set back and let them starve through these periods of depression as best they might.

The echo of all this repeated itself in America during the young manhood of Abe Lincoln, through the stories of the emigrants from those regions. We ourselves still put a few men—free white men—in jail for asking for better wages or even daring to form labor unions as late as 1825, even as they did in England. Out of that welter of human suffering in England came the one man of sufficient intelligence, experience, and courage to show that it was not necessary to put a child into a factory before he was 10 years old nor to compel men to work more than 10 hours a day to succeed in making large profits in business even at that time. And he had the courage to demonstrate it all to a parliamentary committee and to announce boldly that all other factories could do the same if they so desired. do the same if they so desired.

I refer, of course, to Robert Owen, who because he had clearly outgrown his country was driven out of England. The New World—our own America—profited greatly by that banishment, as the world has so often profited by other banishments. For Robert Owen came to America, and in the wilds of Indiana sought to establish an ideal commonwealth for the exploitation of the right of men to life, to liberty, to education, to growth, to service.

Books—so rare in those days—books were to be had in the forest at New Harmony. The influence of this man on American thought and life had very generally been entirely overlooked or but partially understood. The coming of this great soul marked an epoch in American spiritual and economic growth. Many people over a large region drank deeply at that fountain of enlightenment. Among the many who came to New Harmony, a long distance afoot, was a tall impressionable youth, hungry to read books, ready to absorb the wisdom of them, ready to feel passionately the rights of men to the many things which he himself had been denied. He gathered the expansion of spirit which New Harmony taught. He grew greatly under it. He went forth to inspire other men to give free wing to the spirit of social and economic justice. He learned intimately of the injustice first to his own race. Little by little men were coming to understand that there were other by little men were coming to understand that there were other rights besides the three great rights specifically mentioned in the great Declaration of Independence. Men were learning that the discovery of the other rights of men depended on intellectual growth, on spiritual aspiration, on the ability to vision the divinity

And Abe Lincoln contributed much to that end. During his entire life, save only the last 2 years, the institution of slavery not only existed but was defended as a divine institution, and the Bible was constantly cited to prove that great lie. But Abe Lincoln saw through that sham, as he did through so many others. He first understood the rights of white men, but in due time he He first understood the rights of white men, but in due time he saw with perfect clarity that liberty is a universal thought and was not hidden under any one color of skin. To him it was clear that as long as a good Negro slave carpenter could be rented for a dollar a day, that a free white carpenter could not receive more than a dollar a day.

He saw also that the line which marked the border between Negro slavery and white freedom was an enormous barrier through the heart of the Nation. He knew the eternal truth that Old Hickory Jackson had first launched into the faces of his southern brethers, that is that this is a Nation never to be severated into con-ren-that is that this is a Nation never to be separated into conren—that is that this is a Nation hever to be separated into contending parts. He accepted this as the true American doctrine. Fundamentally that doctrine denied the right or power of any State to withdraw from the Union. The spirit of the time was gradually forming around sympathy for our fellow men, and the sympathy—that universal bond of every breathing, living soul—soon wiped out the color line as a bar to liberty.

Abs. Lineary learned early in life that most of the follow and Abe Lincoln learned early in life that most of the follies and foibles of men can be laughed out of the hearts and minds of men and leave no scars or hatreds there. He accepted fully the philosophy of good fellowship. He carried with him the spirit of rejoicing, the laughter of love. He laughed many of the brutalities and insincerities of his time out of the court of humanity. He resorted to fire and sword only when men refused to laugh at their own consuming greed and selfishness. He offered the truce of tolerance in the presence of the dead.

If he could hear his admiring fellow men when they turn sycophant to his spirit, and seek to make a god of him, how Abe Lincoln would laugh today.

He was great because he was part and parcel of his timeenced by thought, in turn influencing thought, following and leading in the flux and flow of the great universal spirit of his generation.

He knew that State rights are only too often in truth State wrongs—fetishes which men still worship out of the recollections of dead days and dead times. He knew this was and ever is to be a Nation—never again to be thought of as an agglomeration of loosely associated States. He accepted the Civil War to secure this one idea throughout eternity. To understand what this means is one of our own great problems today. To get the viewpoint of every man and woman as a citizen of the Nation—primarily with national rights—our first service a national service; to see our Nation paramount the States only as a part of our Nation industry. Nation paramount, the States only as a part of our Nation, industry purely national, to be accepted and directed through national laws and national customs, is our first.

and national customs, is our first.

Abe Lincoln left himself wide open to learn all that came his way—to feel all that might guide his sympathy into the arena of service to his fellow men. He knew instinctively that the permanency of our Republic depended on the education, growth, understanding, and spiritual uplift of the common people, of whom he knew himself one. I would enforce as best I may the fact that as we use that term all truly great men are common, very common men. Through their deeds they furnish the proof positive that common men have the elements of greatness within them. tive that common men have the elements of greatness within them, and that when conditions demand great ideas and heroic actions common men show themselves capable of contributing just those great requirements.

The difficulty lies in the fact that we insist on deifying the The dimculty lies in the fact that we insist on delifying the public men who serve us greatly. We are not satisfied with the one true God; we want many. So we multiply our gods by making gods of our great men. All peoples, strong in ideality, have done this same thing time out of mind. And till we learn that men after all are better only as men, we are apt to go on delifying our great men, even as the Greeks and Romans created their gods and demigods out of their great men.

But it is a bad practice. It often causes us to denounce anyone who tells the truth about these our deities. The truth about them is more important than these man-made deities themselves. We ought to recognize that. If someone points to our special man-made deity and says, "Look at the feet of clay", we ought, in-stead of condemning him and denouncing him, to reply truly: "Yes; I have observed that; but that is not the important thing; look again, see his head towering toward the skies, his eyes are twin stars, listen to his voice, note the divinity in it; his face lit up with the light of a soon-rising sun; on his feet of clay he announces his own divinity; flat-footed on the earth along with all the rest of us, he sees and serves his human kind; he recognizes that God has spoken the kinship of all His children and His own divine relation to them all."

When we create our deities we naturally fall back in awe of When we create our deities we naturally fall back in awe of them. We lose the human touch with them—that one great link of kinship which holds true in all our relations with our fellow men. We cannot afford, we must not lose touch and kinship with any of our race whose life has let him express the universal heroism that lies deeply enshrined in the heart of every human being who has ever drawn the breath of life. We need to hold them close to us and to touch them confidently and familiarly as friend and kinsman. They should be the ties that bind us all together, the inspirers of youth, the assurers of the old, the anchor of the strong, these heroes—our kinsmen; our men and women who shall stand throughout all eternity right among us as women and men, our mothers and fathers, our wives and sweethearts, our sisters and brothers, our playmates, never to be forgotten, human as ourselves, divine as ourselves, only such deities and such men as we ourselves are.

Surely I would not deny Abe Lincoln any need of praise, any Surely I would not deny Abe Lincoln any need of praise, any measure of appreciation. But I would restore him to the fellowmeasure of appreciation. But I would restore him to the fellow-ship of the men and women of his country. I would present him simply and truly with his very human traits to every boy and girl in America. I would have them understand very certainly that they, too, may reach the heights he reached if they be willing to struggle and serve and aspire as ardently and persistently as he did. I would cause him to be recognized and held truly as the comrade of men.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, on February 5, 1935, I was accorded the courtesy of a hearing by the War Department Subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee of the House of Representatives while that subcommittee had under consideration the War Department appropriation bill for 1936, which bill was passed this afternoon. At that hearing I presented certain facts and figures demonstrating the excellent work done by the medical department of the Army at Fitzsimons General Hospital, Denver, Colo., particularly in the treatment of tuberculosis. This work and the results attained should be a source of great satisfaction to the War Department and to the Congress, as they are to all citizens who are familiar with the hospital.

I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by including my statement before the subcommittee.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The statement is as follows:

FITZSIMONS GENERAL HOSPITAL AT DENVER, COLO.

Mr. Lewis. Gentlemen of the committee, I am particularly interested in the great general hospital of the Army in the suburbs of Denver, Colo., the Fitzsimons General Hospital.

GENERAL DESCRIPTION OF THE HOSPITAL

This site was chosen as the result of investigations made by a This site was chosen as the result of investigations made by a commission during the war. Denver was selected as the site because of the excellence of the all-the-year-round climate, to which I shall refer later, and also for strategic reasons—its accessibility to Army posts, the availability of transportation east, west, north, and south, and the fact also that it is near a center of population. As you all know, the population of Denver, including its adjacent suburbs, is about 330,000. It is the largest city between the Missouri River and the Pacific coast. souri River and the Pacific coast.

The construction at Fitzsimons Hospital is what is known as "semipermanent"; that is to say, it was not brick or stone or cement exclusively, but what we are all familiar with and know as the semipermanent construction adopted during the World War.

There have been erected there two buildings of a permanent nature, but those compose a minor part of that great plant. The grounds have an area of approximately 605 acres. They are in grass and trees. It is a beautiful place. The site was donated by the citizens of Denver, who contributed, in large and small sums, approximately $150,000. The cost of the buildings and plant was about $3,831,000. So there is now invested in this hospital about $4,000,000.

Originally the hospital had 1,835 beds, being the largest Army hospital in the United States. That has been reduced of late by closing some wards, so that the present number of beds is only 1,185.

An erroneous impression has been fostered that this hospital is about to fall down; that it is in a terrible condition. Such, of course, is not the case. The fact that it is of semipermanent construction is not conducive to the most economical operation, as has been pointed out repeatedly by the Surgeon General of the Army and others.

COST OF OPERATING THE HOSPITAL

The cost of treating tuberculosis patients is higher than the cost of treating any other class of patients. Yet, of all the Army hospitals in the country, until the last 6 months, the cost of operation per patient per day has been less at Fitzsimons than in any other Army hospital in the country. This is shown by reports from the Surgeon General of the Army.

COMPARATIVE COSTS OF OPERATING VARIOUS ARMY HOSPITALS

The following table, furnished at my request by the Surgeon General, shows the cost per patient per day during the fiscal year 1934. It will be noted that the cost at Fitzsimons was less than at any other Army hospital.

From the following table for the 6-month period July 1 to December 31, 1934, it appears that the Army and Navy Hospital at Hot Springs, Ark., was operated at a cost per patient per day of 81%00 cents less than Fitzsimons; but, with this exception, the operation of Fitzsimons was less expensive than any other Army hospital. This slight difference is more than accounted for by the greater expense of caring for patients affected with tuberculosis.

IMPORTANCE OF KEEPING THE HOSPITAL IN OPERATION

If this hospital were closed, as has been suggested from time to time by the present Surgeon General of the Army, the cost of moving the patients would be approximately fifty or sixty thousand dollars at least. Furthermore, we would be scrapping a $4,000,000 investment in a going concern. I am sure this does not appeal to you as being good business.

Surgeon General Patterson has urged that the Army abandon Fitzsimons Hospital. His views are not shared by his superiors. Authoritatively, I am assured that the General Staff is unalterably opposed to closing it.

I submit that sound governmental policy would dictate the maximum use of this long-established Army hospital. In case of war the existence as going concerns of well-organized hospitals with efficient staffs will save many lives such as in our other wars have been sacrificed unnecessarily. It is clear that the closing of any particular Army hospital would detract just so much from military preparedness.

any particular Army hospital would detract just so much from military preparedness.

Especially is this true in the case of a large hospital designed primarily for the treatment of a particular disease to which men of military age are peculiarly susceptible; a hospital located in a region selected from among all those in the Nation as being unusually well adapted by reason of its altitude and all-year-around climate to the successful treatment of that disease; a hospital where there has been organized, as a result of years of selection, a personnel trained in the use of special equipment to treat that disease; a hospital where there has been developed a technique in the treatment of that disease which has proved extraordinarily successful in arresting and curing that disease and returning its victims to useful civil vocations. Such a hospital is Fitzsimons for the treatment of tuberculosis.

USE OF THE HOSPITAL FOR ALL TUBERCULAR BENEFICIARIES OF THE

Moreover, it seems to me that the hospitalization of governmental wards or patients is a matter for all departments to consider, and that if the best results can be obtained by hospitalizing and treating all Government patients of the Army and the Navy and the Veterans' Administration and the C. C. C. and other departments for a certain particular disease at a certain place, the mere fact that it is somewhat inconvenient to some one bureau or department should not be controlling.

In the summer of 1933 the question of continuing to use Fitz-

"Brig. Gen. Frank T. Hines, chairman, Administrator of Veterans' Affairs; Maj. Gen. R. U. Patterson, Surgeon General United States Army; Rear Admiral P. S. Rossiter, Surgeon General United States Navy; Surg. Gen. H. S. Cummings, United States Public Health Service; Dr. William A. White, Superintendent St. Elizabeths Hospital; Hon. J. Crawford Biggs, Solicitor General of the United States; Col. George E. Ijams, Assistant Administrator of Veterans' Affairs; Gen. George H. Wood, special representative of Administrator on matters pertaining to national homes."

I had the honor of appearing before this Board and presenting certain facts. On July 25, 1933, this Board passed a resolution recommending that Fitzsimons General Hospital should be used for all tuberculous beneficiaries of the Federal Government until the entire hospitalization situation could be thoroughly surveyed. This resolution was approved August 1, 1933, by the President of the United States. The resolution is as follows:

"Resolution adopted by the Federal Board of Hospitalization, Washington, D. C., July 25, 1933

"Whereas the War Department since 1918 has operated the Fitz-simons General Hospital at Denver, Colo.; and
"Whereas the Veterans' Administration prior to the act of March 20, 1933, made extensive use of this facility by reason of the relatively large ex-service population in the area served by it and the lack of Veterans' Administration facilities in the same general area; and

"Whereas regulations issued pursuant to the act of March 20, 1933, authorize the Veterans' Administration to use War, Navy, Public Health, and Interior Department hospitals in emergency cases only for beneficiaries suffering from service-connected disabilities: and

Whereas the War Department has advised the Federal Board of Hospitalization that neither its present nor prospective load at that location is adequate to insure economical operation of that facility; and

"Whereas it has been determined that the estimated hospital load of the War Department and that of the Veterans' Administration for all classes of patients is sufficient at that location to enable that facility to be operated on an economical basis; and "Whereas the Federal Board of Hospitalization is now making a survey of all Government hospital facilities, which survey has not, however, reached the point where a definite determination is warranted; and

"Whereas this survey is expected to result in the submission to the President of definite recommendations to insure the maximum possible use of Government hospital facilities: Therefore be it "Resolved, That the Federal Board of Hospitalization recommends to the President that the Fitzsimons General Hospital at Denver be used for all tuberculous beneficiaries of the Federal Government until such time as the findings of said Board in con-nection with the above survey have been communicated to the President.

CLIMATIC CONDITIONS OF DENVER

I noticed a few minutes ago in glancing through the testimony before this committee that there seems to be an erroneous impres-sion in reference to the alleged very cold and inclement winter climate of Denver. Indeed, I have often been amused, as have my colleagues from Colorado, at the impression which seems to my colleagues from Colorado, at the impression which seems to prevail in Washington in reference to that.

As a matter of fact, gentlemen, the climate of Denver is more equable than that of Washington, as I know from personal experience and as I believe I can demonstrate from the Government reports. Now and then we may have a cold snap, but it never lasts long. We have snows occasionally—although not so frequently as we should wish for the sake of our supply of water for the sake of our supply quently as we should wish for the sake of our supply of water for general municipal purposes and for farm irrigation. But these snows soon melt and disappear. They do not lie on the ground very long. We have an average of 300 days of sunshine each year. In Denver one can play golf or tennis in comfort on many days throughout the average winter. In 1934, so I am informed by aviation officials, there were 360 days of good flying weather at Denver's great municipal and other airports. In truth, the climate of the eastern slope of the Rocky Mountains is probably the best all-the-year-round climate in the country. At least, it is so declared by experts on tuberculosis.

DEVELOPMENT AND SPECIALIZATION IN TREATMENT OF PULMONARY TUBERCULOSIS AT THE HOSPITAL

I have been speaking about the money side of this question. Let me summarize and emphasize by saying again that it seems to me that a Government facility should be open to patients of all Gov-ernment departments, regardless of whether it is operated by one ernment departments, regardless of whether it is operated by one or the other department.

Furthermore, this hospital has a record of treatment of tuberculosis patients—which are more expensive to treat than any other class of patient—a record of having consistently, throughout the years, treated these patients at a less cost than any other Army hospital. And that in spite of the fact that the cost of operation, as has been pointed out, of these buildings is doubtless somewhat more expensive than it would be if the buildings were brought up to date.

I have been talking of dollars and cents. I wish now to speak of other considerations. The purpose of a hospital is to treat and to cure. At Fitzsimons Hospital there has been developed a technique in the treatment of tuberculosis with a staff of trained technicians, and there has been achieved a record of success in the treatment of this disease which has not been excelled anywhere else in the country. I dislike hyperbole, but I state that most emphatically. The results obtained have been the subject of favorable comment and of praise by the medical profession all over the country.

A special technique, particularly in lung surgery, has been developed at Fitzsimons. A skilled staff has been specially trained and facilities provided for the practice of these methods of treatment. The annual report for 1932 of the present Surgeon General of the Army fully and clearly sets forth the excellent results achieved. At page 276 of this report for 1932, in the section devoted to Fitz-simons Hospital, it is said, in reference to the technique and re-sults in the treatment of tuberculosis:

"A noteworthy feature in the treatment of pulmonary tubercu-losis is the marked reduction in the rate of hemorrhages and other complications. In one group of 1,222 admissions there were only 45 pulmonary hemorrhages. In an entire tuberculosis service, with 1,332 admissions, only 108 cases of pulmonary hemorrhages were reported. The marked reduction in the frequency of this complication was due in a large measure to the uniformity in which artificial pneumothorax and other forms of collapse therapy were applied. In four of the largest tuberculosis units 46.7 percent of the patients are receiving artificial pneumothorax treatment. The technique of the initial pneumothorax treatment has been standtechnique of the initial pneumothorax treatment has been standardized and carefully worked out so that there is a marked reduction in accidents which formerly frequently followed this procedure. There has not been a death from pulmonary embolism, and only 11 cases of spontaneous pneumothorax following the introduction of artificial pneumothorax. There has also been a marked reduction in the number of cases developing fluid under treatment. The improvement is due largely to the more judicious and more frequent refills with more careful fluoroscopic check before and after them. Approximately 65 percent of the patients are receiving some form of collapse therapy. The use of this form of treatment has also caused a marked reduction in the number of cases complicated by laryngitis or enterocolitis.

"About 400 cases in the various tuberculosis units were given

"About 400 cases in the various tuberculosis units were given heliotherapy treatment, the total treatments being approximately 9,900. Patients who were classed as 'activity undetermined' were often given heliotherapy as a test of activity. The other types of cases treated were abdominal tuberculosis lesions, fistulas, bone cases treated were abdominal tuberculosis lesions, fistulas, bone and joint cases, glandular and genito-urinary tuberculosis. In pulmonary tuberculosis it is limited to the fibrous cases after they have stood the test of graduated exercise. Seven platforms have now been installed in all of the tuberculosis as well as the medical and surgical wards. The alpine-lamp treatments were given in some cases which were unable to take heliotherapy for various reasons."

And again at page 277:

"The surgery of pulmonary tuberculosis continues to be a most important feature of the surgical work and constitutes about 25 percent of the operations performed. It is to be repeated that surgery is not definitive treatment in pulmonary tuberculosis. The cases which come to operation have had long-continued treatment on the medical wards and the standard nonoperative treatment has failed to give satisfactory results. It is the expert in tuberculosis who must decide when surgery is to be resorted to and must advise as to the form which surgical intervention is to take. The success in carrying out most of these procedures depends on close cooperation between the medical and surgical services. The patient must be made to realize that an operation in this condition is not curative. It may be necessary to operate again, and no matter what is done surgically the disease still remains a medical condition, and medical treatment is as much again, and no matter what is done surgically the disease still remains a medical condition, and medical treatment is as much indicated after as before surgical intervention. The surgeon has no miraculous power, and his work here, as in other departments of surgery, is beset with pitfalls, filled with disappointments, and only occasionally crowned with conspicuous success. This success, if any, must be evaluated by the medical service, for the patient returns to it long before any intelligent opinion of the outcome can be formed. can be formed.

can be formed.

"The same type of surgical procedures were used during this year as in the past. They include phrenic exeresis, pneumolysis, intraplural pneumolysis (the Jacobaeus operation), extra plural thoracoplasty, and drainage and unroofing for empyema. In addition two others have been tried, namely, excision of the scaleneus muscles in conjunction with phrenic exeresis and the unroofing and draining of tuberculosis cavities in the lungs."

DANGER AND INADVISABILITY OF CLOSING THE HOSPITAL

In the spring of 1933, the present Surgeon General of the Army suggested that Fitzsimons Hospital be closed. This aroused a storm of protest from all classes of citizens familiar with the beneficent work of this hospital. Hundreds of letters were received, many from eminent physicians and superintendents of other sanatoria, of which the following is typical:

THE JEWISH CONSUMPTIVES' RELIEF SOCIETY, OFFICE OF THE SUPERINTENDENT, Spivak, Colo., May 6, 1933.

Hon. Lawrence Lewis,
United States Congressman, Washington, D. C.

Dear Sir: I believe that I am expressing the sentiment of the entire medical profession of Denver and of Colorado in stating that we look with serious concern upon the action of the United States Government to close Fitzsimons Hospital.

The character of the work which has emanated from that instituted in the character of the work which has emanated from that instituted in the content of the c

The character of the work which has emanated from that institution has enriched our knowledge of tuberculosis, and has been of value to all of us engaged in practicing this specialty. The dissipation of the valuable material which has accumulated there, and much of which awaits crystallization by the well-trained members of the present staff, would be a distinct loss to medicine in general, and to tuberculosis in particular.

It seems to us that the removal of tuberculosis patients from Fitzsimons Hospital to other regions may be fraught with grave danger to the prospect of their recovery. We realize that in the opinion of some, tuberculosis can be successfully treated at any place. This view, however, is not supported by any scientific data. We do know, however, that the climate and sunshine of Colorado has helped thousands of otherwise hopeless sufferers from the disease to recover their health and to become useful citizens.

We sincerely hope that you will exert your power and influence to persuade the Government to continue Fitzsimons Hospital.

Respectfully yours,

(Signed) H. SCHWATT, M. D. Medical Director and Superintendent.

At that time, a group of eminent medical specialists of national and, indeed, international reputation in the treatment of tuberculosis, while in attendance at the Congress of American Physicians and Surgeons in Washington, D. C., prepared and signed the following statement urging that it be submitted as expert medical opinion on this subject. opinion on this subject.

The doctors point out the advantages both to the patients and to the Government of retaining Fitzsimons Hospital as a medical center for the treatment of tuberculosis.

They draw sharp attention to the very serious responsibility of jeopardizing the lives of patients should they be removed from Fitzsimons to other localities.

The letter from these eminent specialists is as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 9, 1933.

Hon. LAWRENCE LEWIS.

Hon. Lawrence Lewis,

House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Dear Mr. Lewis: Fitzsimons General Hospital, located near Denver, is the largest and best of its kind in the United States for the treatment of tuberculosis. The equipment of the hospital is of the best, and it has an unusually able technical personnel. The work of this hospital has been watched by everyone interested in tuberculosis work, especially those interested in heliotherapy and lung surgery.

The location of Fitzsimons is ideal, there being no better all-theyear-around climate in the United States than is to be found on the eastern plateau of the Rockies. The Southwest is a one-season climate, and so recognized by the private sanatoria directors, who advise their patients to go to the hills or mountains during the summer months. Such procedure would not be practical for the tuberculosis patients of the Army and Navy, and it would entail wery great expense.

We cannot believe that the Surgeon General of the Army would care to assume the responsibility of jeopardizing the lives of the large number of hospitalized patients by moving them to other locations at this time.

It is recognized that in time of war the military medical men find it necessary to issue drastic orders for the removal of patients from various hospitals. The necessities of the situation often override any consideration of the jeopardy of the lives of the patients. We are not now faced with such a situation. Humanitarian considerations should really come first in this instance. . . .

The undersigned Colorado physicians, attending the Congress of the American Physicians and Surgeons, now in session in Wash-ington, urge the Representatives from Colorado in Congress to make every effort to retain Fitzsimons Hospital for the treatment of Army and Navy patients. Your interest and cooperation will be greatly appreciated by the medical profession of Colorado.

very truly yours,
C. F. Hegner, M. D., Denver; Leonard Freeman, M. D., Denver; G. Walter Holden, M. D., Denver; Henry Sewall,
M. D., Denver; Charles E. Sevier, M. D., Denver; John
A. Sevier, M. D., Colorado Springs; James J. Waring,
M. D., Denver; Gerald B. Webb, M. D., Colorado Springs,
Leonard Freeman, Jr., M. D., Denver.

When the question of giving up this hospital was again raised a year ago I received many, many letters and telegrams, which I still have in my files, from patients in the hospital who were worried and made more sick by the idea that they might be taken away. And when the House finally decided to retain it, I received many more letters from patients at Fitzsimons expressing their satisfaction and gratitude.

I am personally very familiar with the hospital. I have visited it repeatedly, and I know the excellent work which is being done there.

there.

HARDSHIPS WHICH WOULD ACCOMPANY CLOSING OF HOSPITAL

I wish to say further: When a Member of Congress appears before the Appropriations Committee, someone is likely to say, "Well, he is just looking at the 'pork barrel' side of it." That is not the case in regard to Fitzsimons Hospital.

I would be here fighting just as strenuously for its retention if it did not mean one cent to the city of Denver or the State of Colorado. This is regarded out there as a symbol of the affectionate care and tender solicitude by the National Government for those men who have lost their health or suffered physically in the service of their country.

Apart from everything else, the people of Denver feel that way about it, and they have lavished every care and attention upon those men. I wish every one of you gentlemen could go with me this afternoon through that hospital and see the excellent work that is being done, and the anxiety expressed by all the patients at any suggestion of being moved.

There is yet another point that I think we should consider, because in these matters of government we must consider elements other than the element of dollars and cents. About this hospital there have been gathered the families of a great many men, some of whom have built or bought their modest little homes in the vicinity with the expectation that the hospital would be continued there. To move these men, especially the ones who have families, would be the cause of a great deal of inconvenience to all, and to would be the cause of a great deal of inconvenience to all, and to very many, not only inconvenience but actual distress—to some, real tragedy.

In closing, I wish to emphasize that the primary function of a hospital is to treat and to cure. If the Government wishes to do everything possible to cure its tuberculous patients, then this institution should be retained for that purpose. The removal of present patients to other localities less desirable in the treatment of this disease would be to many of them a virtual death warrant. To other patients, less seriously afflicted, the change in climate and surroundings would cause marked retardation in their progress toward recovery. Wide recognition has been given to the advancements made by Fitzsimons Hospital in the treatment of tuberculosis, and it would be a serious loss to have the staff and organization assembled there broken up and scattered as the result of closing the hospital. result of closing the hospital.

PURPOSE OF ARMY IN MOVING ITS ACTIVITIES FROM THAT HOSPITAL

PURPOSE OF ARMY IN MOVING ITS ACTIVITIES FROM THAT HOSPITAL Mr. BOLTON. I would like to put one thing in the record in answer to what you have said, and I think it is only fair to General Patterson to do so.

His suggestion as to moving the Army activities from that hospital to the Beaumont Army Hospital was not primarily for the purpose of doing away with the tuberculosis in Denver, but from the standpoint of the efficiency of the Army. I do not think he was so particularly interested as to what would happen to the hospital in the future, but he wanted to make the best showing he could for the tuberculosis hospitals under his direct charge, and he felt that by moving those Army patients to some other Army hospital he would save money for the Regular Establishment of the War Department. of the War Department.

of the War Department.

Mr. Lewis. I am sure that was the idea of our friend, General Patterson, but I simply want to say that I believe that the Army patients could not be treated as effectively for tuberculosis in some other regions as in the vicinity of Denver—at Fitzsimons.

Mr. Bolton. The general's thought was that the majority of the patients in the Fitzsimons Hospital today are not Army patients. More than half of them are Veterans' Bureau patients.

Mr. Lewis. All of which comes back to the point made in the resolution of the Hospitalization Board, to which I referred, that those facilities should be made available to all.

Mr. Bolton. Exactly: but the expense is being borne today en-

Mr. Bolton. Exactly; but the expense is being borne today entirely by the Army, except for the per diem charge made to the Veterans' Bureau by the Army, which, however, does not cover the cost.

Mr. Lewis. The general says, "I am charged with that"; but we, as Members of Congress, have to look at the whole picture. All the money comes from the Federal Treasury—is raised by Fed-

Mr. Bolton. But we here, as members of the subcommittee on the War Department appropriations bill, are looking out for the finances of the War Department.

Mr. Lewis. That is true; but I think we should also bear the other fact in mind. How and where can the Government most effectively and economically treat all Government patients afflicted with a certain disease—in this case tuberculosis?

Mr. Snyder. What is the average length of time that these men spend in that hospital?

Mr. Lewis. I am unable to answer that question, although I know there are several men I have seen from year to year who have been there since they were brought back on stretchers from France. They are not all tuberculosis cases, although a majority of them are.

I might say that I can right away think of many men in Denver who are leading useful lives in civil occupations who spent from a few months to a year or 2 years in that hospital. Now they are recovered and healthy and are living in Colorado and going about their professional duties or doing other work. But as to the average length of time patients stay in the hospital, I could not say.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado?

Mr. SNELL. Reserving the right to object, I want to ask the gentleman what he expects to take up on the first part of the week?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Monday is District of Columbia day and on Tuesday it is expected to take up the Farm Mortgage Act.

Mr. SNELL. Have they had a rule for that?

Mr. BOILEAU. The other day that bill was made privileged by the House.

Mr. SNELL. Very well. As I understand, Monday will be District of Columbia day and on Tuesday the Farm Mortgage Act will be taken up?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Monday, February 25, 1935

The Chaplain, Rev. Z@Barney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, whose kingdom is everlasting and power infinite, whose glory filleth the heavens and whose mercy is over all Thy works: give us thankful hearts as another day is added to our lives, wherein our thoughts and endeavors may be sanctified by Thy divine compassion, for Thou lovest righteousness and hatest iniquity. Lead us by Thy spirit out of the bondage of the fear of men into the perfect freedom which belongeth to the sons of God, that with a conscience void of offense we may be given strength equal to the burdens of the day, wisdom sufficient for each problem of the hour; and grant that what we do here may be approved not only of our fellow men but of Thee, O God, our strength, our guide, and our eternal Father. We ask it in the name of Him who is both Son of Man and Son of God, Jesus Christ, our Lord. Amen.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Oregon, which was referred to the Committee on Finance:

Senate Joint Memorial 12

To the Honorable Franklin D. Roosevelt, President of the United States, and to the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

We, your memorialists, the Thirty-eighth Legislative Assembly of the State of Oregon, convened in regular session, respectfully rep-

Whereas the production of cherries suitable for maraschino and glace manufacture has reached such proportions on the Pacific coast that there is at the present time more than an ample supply of suitable varieties to satisfy all demands for that type of cherries in the United States; and

Whereas under the protection provided by the present tariff covering cherries natural, sulphured or in brine, cherries produced on the Pacific coast are now finding a market in the United States;

whereas the sale of these cherries since this tariff became effective has made substantial returns to many thousands of Oregon people—producers, processors, and laborers employed in harvesting and preparing the cherries for market alike; and

Whereas it is of vital importance to the people of Oregon that the cherry industry of the Pacific coast be protected adequately against destructive foreign importation; and

Whereas any reduction in the present tariff will mean a severe blow to the Pacific-coast cherry industry, resulting in the greater portion of the cherry crop being unmarketed, thus incurring severe losses to the cherry producers, laborers, and manufacturers of domestic materials and supplies used in the preparation of these cherries for market: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of the State of Oregon (the house of representatives jointly concurring therein). That we, your memorialists, the Thirty-eighth Legislative Assembly of the State of Oregon, convened in regular session, respectfully petition the Congress of the United States to refrain from the reduction, in any part, of the present tariff rates on cherries, natural, sulphured, or in brine; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this memorial be transmitted to the President of the United States, the President of the United States Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, the Secretary of Agriculture of the United States, the chairman of the committee for reciprocity information of the Tariff Commission, and to each Member of the Organ delegation in Congress Member of the Oregon delegation in Congress.

and principal payments incurred during the period of higher values and higher earning power "; and Whereas in his message to Congress on April 13, 1933, the President made the further declaration concerning the establishment of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation that "the broad interests of the Nation require that special safeguards should be thrown around home ownership as a guaranty of social and economic stability, and that to protect home owners from inequitable enforced liquidation in a time of general distress is a proper concern of the Government"; and Government"; and

Whereas by reason of said act the homes of thousands of substantial and deserving citizens of the United States have been saved and many thousands of small mortgage holders have been relieved of great financial embarrassment; and

Whereas the entire amount appropriated and bonds authorized under the provisions of the present act are now practically exhausted and there are many thousands of equally substantial, deserving, and distressed citizens who have been unable to avail themselves of the benefits of said act; and

Senate Joint Memorial 3

A joint memorial memorializing Congress of the United States of America to eliminate the taxation of gasoline by the Federal Government

Whereas the Congress of the United States of America has imposed a tax upon all sales of gasoline; and

Whereas the State of Colorado and all other several States of the United States have already imposed taxes upon such sales; and Whereas the Federal tax on such sales is untimely and prohibitive and, coupled with the respective State taxes on such sales, places a burden upon the users of gasoline beyond that which they should carry and beyond that which the traffic can legitimately bear; and

mately bear; and
Whereas the taxation of sales of gasoline should properly be left to the exclusive use of the States as a means of providing funds for road construction and maintenance: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of the State of Colorado (the house of representatives concurring therein), That the Congress of the United States be, and it is hereby, respectfully memorialized to enact with all convenient speed such legislation as may be necessary to abolish the Federal gasoline sales tax and to surrender to the States exclusively the power to tax such sales in the future; and he it further and he it further

Mr. METCALF presented the following resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

Resolution memorializing Congress in regard to the so-called "cotton processing tax"

Whereas the Congress of the United States for the purpose of extending aid to growers of cotton have levied a tax called the "cotton processing tax" for the manufacture of cotton and textile products; and

Whereas the imposition of such a tax upon the principal industry of the State of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations has proven an unbearable financial burden, jeopardizing the continued successful existence of the textile industry; and

Whereas the majority of our cities and towns and a large proportion of our citizens and their families are dependent for the means of existence upon this industry: Therefore be it means of existence upon this industry: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the General Assembly of the State of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations hereby memorializes the Congress of the United States for relief from the oppressive burden of this tax and requests the repeal of such tax or spreading of the tax over the industry in general; and be it further

Mr. GEORGE presented the following resolution of the House of Representatives of the State of Georgia, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

Whereas there is now pending before the National Congress the Wagner-Costigan antilynching bill; and

Whereas said bill undertakes to provide for Federal intervention in the enforcement of local criminal laws and makes local officials subject to prosecution for felony upon what may be vague charges of fallure to protect persons in their custody, and further provides that if within SO days local authorities shall not act diligently in the matter of mob violence, the Federal Government shall thereby acquire jurisdiction; and

Whereas said bill further provides that any county in which a person is injured or killed by a mob shall be liable to the injured person or his heirs in amounts of as much as $10,000 liquidated damages; and

Whereas said bill is aimed directly at the South and is a reflection upon its people, its State and local governments, and is violative of the principle of State rights; and

Whereas the provisions of said bill would subject the taxpayers of such local governments to penalties for which they may not justly be liable for, and which might arise out of depredations committed by persons from other localities including hired thugs or strike breakers imported from other sections; and

Whereas various persons through the medium of interracial societies and other organizations are seeking to convey the impression that the white citizens of Georgia and of the South are in favor of this bill, which persons do not represent truly the white manhood and womanhood of the South: Therefore be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of Georgia, That we condemn this bill as a violation of State rights a reflection upon the people of the South and their local officials; be it further

Resolved, That we condemn lynching and mob violence in any form and call upon our citizens and officials to vigorously suppress the same by means now amply provided by the laws of this State, under which no Federal intervention is necessary; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to the National Senate and House and to the Senators and Congressmen from Georgia.

Whereas facts and information have been submitted to show that most quantities of natural gas are going to waste in Texas and other gas fields, and further tending to show that companies engaged in the production and transportation of natural gas have entered into monopolistic agreements and practices which result in stifling competition, in the restraint of trade and in fixing unfair and unreasonable prices of natural gas and forcing numerous cities to use mixed (natural and artificial) gas; and

Whereas a Cities Alliance has been organized for the nursonal

Whereas a Cities Alliance has been organized for the purpose of combating this condition of monopoly in the natural-gas industry through the United States, said alliance having been organized at the suggestion of the United States Conference of Mayors, and at present composed of the cities of Indianapolis and South Bend, Ind.; Detroit and Hamtramck, Mich.; St. Paul, Minn.; St. Louis, Mo.; Louisville, Ky.; Wheeling, W. Mr. LA FOLLETTE presented the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

Joint resolution relating to a protective tariff on agricultural products

Whereas the national administration and the Congress, while pretending to help the American farmer, have, on the contrary, neglected him by leaving the American home market wide open to the importation of foreign agricultural products; and

Whereas cheese comes in from Europe, butter from New Zealand, rye from Europe, oats from Canada and South America, vegetable rye from Europe, oats from Canada and South America, vegetable oils from the Philippines, barley and barley malt from a dozen countries in tremendous quantities, especially from Canada—all in competition with the products of American farms, which is strong evidence that the farmers of foreign countries are better represented at Washington and are more the concern of the administration than are the farmers of the United States of America; and

Whereas the last Congress placed a tariff of 2 cents a pound of Whereas the last Congress placed a tariff of 2 cents a pound of Whereas the last Congress placed a tariff of 2 cents a pound of Wiscons and Wiscons and American farms, and every dollar paid therefor going out of this country to the detriment of American farmers and American interests; and in addition, foreign barley malt, ready for the manufacture of beer, is being imported, such imports in some months exceeding 700,000 bushels; and

Whereas the last Congress placed a tariff of 3 cents a pound on whereas the last Congress placed a tarm of 3 cents a pound on coconut oil from the Philippines, and the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Henry Morgenthau, under authority given the President by Congress at its last session, has suspended that tariff protection, to the great detriment of American farmers engaged in dairy and hog-raising industries, and in like manner the tariff on foreign oats and hay has been taken off by Department action: Therefore be it

Resolved by the senate (the assembly concurring), That the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin respectfully memorializes the Congress of the United States to enact an adequate protective tariff to protect the products of American farms against foreign competition and to save the home market for the American farmer, to whom it rightfully belongs; and be it further

Resolved, That this legislature respectfully memorializes the Congress of the United States to repeal all laws by which the power to change or suspend tariff rates has been delegated to department heads of the Federal Government; and be it further

Resolved, That this legislature respectfully petitions the national administration to make no further reciprocal tariff or trade agreements by which the interests of American farmers are sacrificed; and be it further

Resolved, That properly attested copies of this resolution be sent to the President of the United States, to the Secretary of the Treasury, to both Houses of Congress, and to each Wisconsin Representative.

Joint resolution memorializing the Congress to provide for public power development and especially rural electrification in the upper Mississippi Valley as proposed in pending bills in Congress

Whereas the Federal Government has under construction a series of dams across the upper Mississippi River; and Whereas this construction will make available a large amount of water power for the generation of electrical energy at reasonable rates; and

Whereas there is an extensive demand for electrical energy in the upper Mississippi Valley at the lower rates which would be made possible by the use of this unlimited water power; and

Whereas the more extensive use of electricity on the farm, and in the home, will do much to raise the American standard of living; and

Whereas cheaper power will make possible a much-desired industrial development of our smaller cities; and

Whereas there has been introduced in each House of the Con whereas there has been introduced in each house of the Congress bills providing for the development of the upper Mississippi Valley, with special emphasis on the generation of electrical energy, and designated as the Upper Mississippi Valley Authority, or the U. M. V. A.; and

Mr. LA FOLLETTE also presented the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

Joint resolution memorializing Congress to amend the Constitution of the United States to provide for a referendum of the people before war can be declared

Whereas experience has proved that war is a costly failure in settling differences between nations; and
Whereas the recent senatorial investigation has shown the manipulation and selfish interest of the war-munitions industries in war; and

Whereas the people of a nation pay the ruthless cost of war in lives and wrecked bodies and minds and bear the financial burden of war in taxes and the interruption of their means of livelihood while the munition manufacturers reap immense profits therefrom: Therefore be it

Resolved by the assembly (the senate concurring), That the Legislature of Wisconsin respectfully memorialize the Congress of the United States to immediately take steps to amend the Constitution of the United States to provide that the Congress of the United States cannot declare war until the people of this Nation, by a popular referendum vote, favor such war, except that such a referendum shall not be necessary in the case of a war to repel an invasion of this country; and be it further

Mr. LA FOLLETTE also presented the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

Joint resolution memoralizing Congress to make the manufacture and sale of munitions of war a monopoly of the Federal Govern-ment to take the profit out of war

Whereas, The Senate committee under the direction of Senator Gerald P. Nye has disclosed startling revelations as to the greedy part played by the munition manufacturers of this country in war and the preparation for war so that the profits therefrom have become the most serious challenge to the peace of the world; and

Whereas the World War created thousands of new American millionaires and moved some millionaires into the neighborhood of the billionaire class at the expense of the taxpayers of the country; and

Whereas this investigation is bringing forth volumes of evidence revealing how profitable is this world-wide business of whipping up froths of hatred, suspicion, and fear between peoples such as occasion larger and ever larger programs of preparation for war; and

Whereas the munition manufacturers depend for their profits whereas the munition manufacturers depend for their profits upon their ability to keep nations frightened of one another, which fright and resulting preparation for war invariably leads to disaster for millions of people and scores of governments, disaster such as not only visited this Nation during the World War, but which is still with us with its grim reminders of disabled bodies and wrecked minds and a public debt to be borne for generations yet to come, a disaster of economic wreckage blocking the path of progress even now; and

Whereas that although today, 17 years after the war, the whole world is crushed with debt and faced with bankruptcy from the last war, yet the nations of the world have found it possible and desirable to spend $7,000,000,000 a year getting ready for more war; and war; and

Whereas these same munition makers, while pretending patriotism in making armaments for this country, nevertheless selt their products of destruction to other nations to help them defend themselves against this country; and

Whereas the annual average profits of the Atlas Powder Co. during the 4 years of the World War increased nearly $1,900,000; the annual profits of the Hercules Powder Co. increased $6,000,000; the profits of the Anaconda Copper Co. increased $24,000,000; the United States Steel Co. over $130,000,000; and the Bethlehem Steel Co. over $42,000,000; and the average peace-time profit of the Du Ponts grew from $6,000,000 to $58,000,000 during the war; and Whereas it is glaringly obvious that these outrageous profits

Whereas it is glaringly obvious that these outrageous profits are a direct stimulus to the munition makers to encourage war and the preparation for war; and

Whereas we can never have world peace until this profit is taken from war: Therefore be it

Resolved by the assembly (the senate concurring), That the Legislature of Wisconsin respectfully memorializes the Congress of the United States to immediately pass the necessary legislation to make the manufacture and sale of war munitions a monopoly of the Government of the United States; and be it further

Resolved, That properly attested copies of this resolution be sent to both Houses of the Congress of the United States and to each Wisconsin Member thereof.

Whereas the Congress of the United States is now in session to consider such legislation as may improve the public welfare; and

La Follette, United States Senator from the State of Wisconsin, be requested by this body, consisting of 307 railway employees, exclusive of their families, to support to the fullest extent enactment of legislation to modify the fourth section of the Interstate Commerce Act to regulate commerce so as to permit the railroads to compete with unregulated forms of transportation as recom-mended by the Federal Coordinator and covered in the Pettengill bill, H. A joint memorial to the Honorable Henry A. Wallace, Secretary of Agriculture

Whereas the sugar-beet industry is and has been one of the largest and most beneficial crops produced in the State of Idaho, and at the present time is more important than ever before for the reason that larger acreages are necessary to absorb the surplus acres occasioned by the program of the Agricultural Adjustment

Whereas in the past years there has been considerable strife

Whereas in the past years there has been considerable strife and misunderstanding in the negotiations of contracts between the sugar-beet producers and the sugar companies; and

Whereas an accumulation of huge stocks of off-shore produced sugar has been permitted to accumulate at the expense of the domestic beet and cane sugar; and

A memorial to the President of the United States of America requesting an investigation of flood control of the Yellowstone

To the honorable the President of the United States of America:

Whereas during the low stage of the river the water becomes contaminated and unfit for household use, endangering the health of all who are obliged to drink it, it being the only source of supply for almost the entire population living on the river from where it leaves the mountains to its junction with the Missouri;

Whereas if the flow was properly controlled it would assist materially in furnishing water for navigation during the low-water period on the Missouri River; and

Whereas your memorialists believe that it is practicable to construct controlling works at or near where the river leaves the Yellowstone Lake that will retain a portion of the water from the melting snow and allow it to flow during the period of low water, it would correct the unfortunate conditions previously recited in this memorial and would also add to the beauty of the falls below by increasing the flow over the falls at the period when the majority of tourists visit the park and would make the lake more attractive by keeping it at a more constant level; and

It is not the thought of your memorialists to raise the level of the lake above its present high-water level; and Whereas your memorialists are advised that a new bridge is to be built to replace the one known as the "fishing bridge" crossing the river just below where it leaves the lake, we suggest that you cause an investigation to be made as to the advisability of combining the bridge with suitable gates or appliances for the proper control of the water, or if such construction is not practical, use such other method as may be suggested by competent engineers: Now, therefore, be it

CALIFORNIA-PACIFIC INTERNATIONAL EXPOSITION

Mr. JOHNSON. From the Foreign Relations Committee I report back favorably, with an amendment, the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 94) providing for the participation of the United States in the California-Pacific International Exposition to be held at San Diego, Calif., in 1935 and 1936, authorizing an appropriation therefor, and for other purposes, and I submit a report (No. 189) thereon. Because time is of the essence of the matter and the exposition will be held very shortly, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from California?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator whether this exposition is to be held in southern California, where a few years ago there was an exposition in which the United States Government participated?

Mr. JOHNSON. At exactly the same location, in San Diego, in the park there on the hillsides.

Mr. KING. 'I may say that I shall not object to the consideration of the joint resolution, but I shall feel constrained to vote against it. Beginning with the exposition in St. Louis years ago, when I happened to be a Member of the House and opposed it, frequent appeals to the Federal Government for appropriations for expositions have come to us, and it seems to me we have gone a little extreme. I see no justification for the Federal Government to be called upon to support expositions being held in all parts of the United States.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection the Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The amendment of the Committee on Foreign Relations was, on page 8, line 16, after the word "may", to insert the word "be", so as to make the joint resolution read:

word "De", so as to make the joint resolution read:

REGULATION OF COMMERCE IN PETROLEUM

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I introduce a bill for reference to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

Mr. President, this bill has for its purpose the regulation of the petroleum industry. The bill is very similar to one introduced in the last Congress. That bill was reported favorably by the committee: but, because the bill came in late, the Senate had no time to consider it.

I ask permission to have printed in the RECORD at this point a statement in explanation of the various sections of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The bill (S. 2027) to regulate commerce in petroleum, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

The statement submitted by Mr. Thomas of Oklahoma is as follows:

Because oil is an exhaustible and irreplaceable natural resource of the greatest importance to our industrial life and a vital element in the national defense, it is imperative that this natural resource should not be wasted, dissipated, put to improper uses, or so exploited until it becomes a liability rather than an asset. It is an important element in the industrial life of 18 or 20 States of the Nation. To some of these States it is the most important factor the properties. Nation. To some of these States it is the most important factor in prosperity. It employs much more than a million persons. Its products are of importance to every human being in our land. It is one of the most profitable, if not the very most profitable, sources of public revenue. It furnishes one of the principal items of income to the residents of oil-producing States. In time of war it is of almost equal importance with the arms borne by our Army or Navy. In the recent war, one of the outstanding leaders declared that each drop of gasoline was worth a drop of blood.

This natural resource is therefore of such interest to the entire Nation that there should be some national policy which would aid in its conservation and in its proper development. Production of Nation that there should be some national policy which would aid in its conservation and in its proper development. Production of larger quantities of petroleum than the Nation can consume inevitably results in a waste of this product and in its being turned to inferior uses. Overproduction also results in sales of petroleum and its products below the cost of production, a course which inevitably causes unemployment and loss of purchasing power in the oil-producing States, with the consequent loss of customers for the industrial States of the Union. Since no method exists in any one State by which that State can protect itself against demoralization of its own petroleum industries through overproduction in another State, and since no single State can have against demoralization of its own petroleum industries through overproduction in another State, and since no single State can have either the authority or the machinery by which to make an exact and scientific estimate of the petroleum requirements of the Nation, I am here proposing a measure which will set up an impartial board which shall be given the authority and the means to make a scientific determination of the amount of petroleum and of its various products which are required to supply the demand for consumption in this country and for export from this country, and by the same scientific and impartial methods to determine just what portion of that national demand justly and equitably belong to each one of the various oil-producing States. This will carry the what portion of that national demand justly and equitably belong to each one of the various oil-producing States. This will carry the modern program of scientific planning into an industry which has not been able to make plans and where State lines and State jealousies have too often prevented any scientific estimate of any single State's proper share of the national production.

Definite limitations on imports are proposed, based upon a ratio to the national demand.

to the national demand.

to the national demand.

The regulation of all sources of supply is of vital importance if the industry is to make any serious plans. It is quite evident that this industry is of such importance in our national life that there should be legislation which will enable both the industry and the oil-producing States to prevent disastrous overproduction with its resultant waste and its effect upon employment. This bill sets up the machinery by which the Government furnishes to the States a scientific determination of the amount of production necessary to meet all the demand after considering the amount of imports which may be admitted, and also an impartial and scientific determination of the amount of such production which properly and legitimately belongs to each one of the oil-producing States which may be used by those States separately or by any group of them in negitimately belongs to each one of the oil-producing States which may be used by those States separately or by any group of them in an interstate compact in arriving at their allocations within a State. This should eliminate the suicidal race between producers within any one State or between two or more States, which has so often been caused by the fear that their natural markets might be taken from them and that they might be deprived of their proper share of the national production.

taken from them and that they might be deprived of their proper share of the national production.

It is believed that through cooperation and State enforcement of State orders, or through State compacts with the Federal law in the background, it will be possible to keep the production by each oil State within the share of the national production which properly belongs to that State without positive action being taken by the Federal Government. However, provision is made for the Federal Government to act where it is necessary to prevent the demoralization of the industry or to prevent any single State or any group of operators in a State from endeavoring to obtain more than their just and proper share of the national production.

Experience has demonstrated that the oil resources of a State may be exploited by a handful of men, a minority of the operators in that State, to the damage of the prosperity of the whole industry in that State and to the loss of public revenues and the diminishing of employment and consuming power. This bill is intended to protect each oil State from any group of exploiters within its own borders. It is also intended to assure to each State protection from what practically amounts to invasion of its industrial life by another State. It also endeavors to protect all the States, the Nation as a whole, against the improper use and the wastage of one of the most valuable of our natural resources. Stripper wells and wells of settled production should be practically exempt from production restrictions under this bill as they are at the present time, and their production made free to move in commerce, without any hindrance or supervision from any source, it being assumed that the commerce quotas would correspond with the present code allocations to States and those made by State authorities to pools and properties, only flush pools and properties being affected.

This is a minimum of Federal regulation with every consideration given to State sovereignty. It does not constitute Federal control. On the other hand, it does offer to each oil State a degree of protection which it has never had in the past so that each State may absolutely control production within its own limits and be guaranteed its due share of the national production. The following is a comment on the various sections of the measure which I am introducing:

The following is a comment on the various sections of the measure which I am introducing:

Notes on Bill to Regulate Commerce in Petroleum, and for OTHER PURPOSES

DECLARATION OF POLICY

Section 1: The facts stated in this section were fully developed in recent hearings of the Cole committee and are familiar to all who know the petroleum industry.

The last sentence in the section is regarded as most important, because it covers the factual basis for a system of control which will embrace local or intrastate transactions as well as those occurring in interstate and foreign commerce. Without a finding of the ing in interstate and foreign commerce. Without a finding of the kind indicated by this sentence the legislation might fall in the class that was condemned by the Supreme Court in Hill v. Wallace (259 U. S. 44), where Congress had undertaken to regulate local transactions in grain futures but had made no finding that they affect interstate commerce. After that decision was rendered. Congress enacted a new law of similar import, with an express finding that the local transactions do affect interstate commerce, and this law was sustained in Chicago Board of Trade v. Olsen (262 U. S. 1) in its application to local transactions.

FEDERAL PETROLEUM BOARD

Section 2: This section is designed to secure a board which will have the benefit of the knowledge and experience of the industry and at the same time protect the public interest.

To secure the proper talent it would seem necessary to fix compensation comparable with that of members of the Interstate Commerce Commission of the Federal Trade Commission. The special tax imposed upon the industry under the Revenue Act of 1934, the original purpose of which was to defray the expenses of code administration, will more than cover the outlay on account of this administration, will more than cover the outlay on account of this

The provision for a vice chairman will enable the board to function when the Secretary of the Interior is occupied with other duties of his office.

INVESTIGATION AND REPORTS

Section 3: The reports authorized in this act and the power to inspect books, records, etc., will make it possible to check up on persons suspected of violating the law.

COOPERATION WITH OTHER BODIES

Section 4: This section authorizes cooperative action with State agencies and also makes available material concerning the oil industry which is in possession of other Federal departments or hureaus

IMPORTS

Section 5: The intended ratio of imports to domestic production is 4.51 percent, the ratio for the last half of 1932 (105,855 barrels) to the average daily allowable production for the United States (2,345,600 barrels), as fixed in the orders of the Petroleum Administrator for the 12-month period from October 1933 to September 1934, inclusive. Since, under this bill imports are to be fixed on a quarterly basis and domestic allowable for commerce on a monthly basis, and only 1 month of the domestic allowable will have been determined when imports for the quarter are fixed, it is necessary to take 1 month domestic and multiply it by 3 to arrive at imports for the quarter year reckoning period. Hence, the 13.53 percentage figure in this section.

This entire section has been worked out to correspond in sub-

This entire section has been worked out to correspond in sub-stance and detail with the present plan of voluntary restrictions upon imports as agreed to by importers.

It is slight technical, but necessarily so. A definite standard or basis is provided. Otherwise it might be construed as an undue delegation of legislative power.

ASCERTAINMENT AND APPORTIONMENT IN UNITED STATES

Section 6: It will be observed that this section does not authorize any action effective in the States. It merely provides for the establishment of a basis upon which the States can proceed in a coordinated manner and upon which the Federal authority can proceed under a subsequent section if it becomes necessary.

In other words, the determinations here authorized will be merely persuasive unless and until events require the invocation of section 9

That some such Federal coordination is necessary in times of overproduction is generally conceded. The States cannot agree among themselves. They vie with each other and are urged on by operators within their respective borders. Waste and demoralization of commerce ensue, as past experience shows.

INTERSTATE COMPACTS

Section 7: Whether interstate compacts are feasible is debated in the industry. All factions seem to favor permissive legislation such as this section would be. It would place the States in position to make the effort. It would constitute a virtual request on the part of Congress that the States, through their power to control production, relieve Congress of the duty of dealing with commerce in petroleum.

As recently pointed by Mr. Pettengill, of Indiana, it might be dangerous for Congress to surrender to the States a measure of its authority to regulate commerce, especially if the surrender were in the form of a blank check. But it will be noticed that this section requires compact allowables to coincide with demand as determined by the board. Thus the States would be precluded, not only from agreeing upon allowables too high, but also from fixing them at figures too low, to the possible injury of consumers or the nonproducing States. or the nonproducing States.

LIMITATION UPON FIXING QUOTAS

Section 8: This section definitely limits the authority of the board to establish any quotas within any State whose production is kept within its equitable share of the national production as determined by the board.

QUOTAS IN COMMERCE

Section 9: This is the vital section. It observes the distinction between production and commerce and undertakes to deal only between production and commerce and undertakes to deal only with sales or other acts of commerce. Sales quotas, not production quotas, would be authorized. Moreover, the Federal authority would keep hands off entirely so long as the State as a whole remained in line. No restriction of sales from pools or properties would be permitted under this act in the absence of overproduction for the State as a whole, which is in complete consonance with the contention of some of the States that they should be allowed to deal with their internal production problems.

On the constitutional right of Congress to treat all commerce in allowed to deal with their internal production problems.

On the constitutional right of Congress to treat all commerce in crude petroleum as a unit, stream or current, for the purposes of this kind or regulation, and to ignore the fact that some transactions are intrastate, the following cases are cited:

Railroad Commission of Wisconsin v. C., B. & Q. (257 U. S. 563);

Shreveport Rate Case (234 U. S. 342), and Minnesota Rate Case (230 U. S. 352), developing and applying the unit doctrine to commingled commerce.

Stafford v. Wallace (258 U. S. 495), upholding the Packers and Stock Yards Act, in its application to local and apparently isolated transactions, on the ground that they affected a stream or current of interstate commerce.

Chicago Board of Trade v. Olsen (262 U. S. 1), sustaining the rent of interstate commerce.

Chicago Board of Trade v. Olsen (262 U. S. 1), sustaining the Grain Futures Act in similar application, on the same ground.

Lemke v. Farmers Grain Co. (250 U. S. 50), setting aside the North Dakota regulatory act, because it invaded the sphere of Congress in dealing with a commerce of the commingled type the greater portion of which was interstate.

As to the practical operation of this section of the bill, there need be no confusion. Apart for statistical work, factual studies, determination of national demand, and its allocation to the prodetermination of national demand, and its allocation to the producing States, the board would take no action so long as the production of the country and imports are in balance with demand for domestic consumption and export, and there is no State where too large a share of the market is being seized. It is conceivable too large a share of the market is being seized. It is conceivable that through cooperation and State enforcement of State orders or through State compacts, with the Federal law in the background, it might never be necessary for the Federal agency to go further. But upon the occurrence, despite State efforts, of excess production and its movement into commerce in excessive quantities, the board would act under this section. Imports being at a rate found proper and fair, the fixing of domestic quotas in commerce would be in order. They might be fixed for and in a single State or for and in several or all of the producing States. But quotas in commerce would be fixed.

For the same reasons that stripper wells and settled production

For the same reasons that stripper wells and settled production are virtually exempt from production restrictions now, they would be exempt under the quotas-in-commerce system. In other words, their production would be free to move in commerce without let or hindrance or supervision from any source. On the hypothesis that present code allocations to States, and those by State authority to pools and properties, would be fair and proper if restrictions were upon a production basis, it may be assumed that commerce quotas would correspond to them in quantity. Only flush pools and properties would presently be affected by the new system.

system.

It would be futile, of course, to fix them for States and pools and stop there. This is true because neither the State nor the pool could respond; there would be no way to enforce an order so general; hence the necessity of fixing commerce quotas for individual properties. This, of course, could be done on the same basis that production allowables are now fixed. The States woull be left free to exert all their powers to prevent overproduction, but if any State should approve or tolerate excess production, the excess would be under ban against sale, exchange consignment, or other act of commerce. In a broad sense the Federal act and the board would simply deal with sales instead of production. But never would there be any interference except in localities and cases where production proration applies or should apply and is not

This is submitted as a minimum of Federal regulation with every consideration for State sovereignty.

CERTIFICATES OF CLEARANCE

Section 10: This section makes possible enforcement of the law in whatever sections violations are believed to occur by requiring certificates of clearance.

RULES AND REGULATIONS

Section 11: This section merely establishes the usual authority for the necessary rules and regulations.

HEARINGS

Section 12: This section, while providing for the issuance of temporary quotas in an emergency, prescribes hearings shall be held after public notice before the usual quotas are prescribed.

WITNESSES AND TESTIMONY

Section 13: This section grants to the board authority to examine witnesses, take affidavits, issue subpenas, and follow the usual processes necessary for hearings previously authorized.

COURT REVIEW

Section 14: This section provides for court review by any persons adversely affected after the case had been heard in a threejudge court.

ENFORCEMENT OF ORDERS

Section 15: This section merely authorizes the application of the Attorney General or the board to a United States district court for enforcement of orders.

PENALTIES

Section 16: The penalty based upon value is intended to reach cases where, because of volume involved, the offender could afford to pay the stated fines and still escape with a profit. Cases of this kind have occurred under State law imposing fixed fines without regard to values.

Other provisions of the section call for no comment.

MOVEMENT OF EXCESSES OVER STATE PRODUCTION ALLOWABLES

Section 17: The purpose here is to reach to the individual case where the State has complied with the national program but the operator has violated State orders. Many such cases have occurred during the code period.

NATIONAL INDUSTRIAL RECOVERY ACT

Section 18: This section leaves unchanged those parts of the oil code which are not inconsistent with this act.

Sections 19-22: These are the customary sections concerning a saving clause, separability of provisions, definitions, and the short title of the act.

PHILIPPINE CONSTITUTION

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, the new constitution for the Philippine Islands as provided for in the independence act of 1934 has been put in final shape. Inasmuch as that constitution must conform to the act of Congress passed last year, I should like permission to have printed in the RECORD the final draft so that Senators interested may read it.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, did I understand the Senator to say that it is the final draft of the Philippine Constitution?

PRINTING OF EDITORIALS IN THE RECORD

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD two brief editorials, one from the Washington Herald under date of February 23, 1935, and another from the New York Times dated February 23, 1935.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. COUZENS. I object until I may be advised of the nature of the editorials.

Mr. ROBINSON. The editorial in the Washington Herald to which I referred is entitled "Support the President." The editorial in the New York Times is entitled "The Senate Polled."

Mr. COUZENS. I object to the editorial from the Washington Herald going into the RECORD. It is an attempt to castigate all Senators who do not agree with Mr. Hearst and the President. I think it is a violation of the rule whereby Senators are not permitted to challenge the motives or say anything derogatory of another Senator. If I interpret the editorial correctly, it is derogatory to Members of the Senate. If the Senator wants to read it, I shall still consider it a violation of the rule, and I object.

Mr. ROBINSON. I think the Senator from Michigan is in error. The editorial to which I am referring is under date of February 23, and I have not discovered anything in it reflecting on anyone.

Mr. COUZENS. The editorial to which I have reference appeared in the Hearst newspapers this morning. I have no means of knowing what is in the editorial which the Senator has submitted. The editorial appearing in the Washington Herald of this morning is offensive and will be discussed at a later time.

Mr. ROBINSON. That is not the editorial to which I am referring.

Mr. COUZENS. Then, I do not object. The Senator did not explain just what he was offering for the RECORD.

Mr. ROBINSON. I did explain that it is under date of February 23, 1935. If the Senator desires to object, of course he is at liberty to do so. I never insert anything in the RECORD which I think is in violation of a rule, I may say to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. COUZENS. I do not so charge.

Mr. ROBINSON. My purpose is to conform to the rules of the Senate. The editorial is an argument in favor of the President's position with respect to the wage issue, but there is nothing in it which in my opinion reflects on anyone.

Mr. COUZENS. Then, I have no objection.
Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, does the editorial refer in a derogatory manner to any Member of this body?

Mr. ROBINSON. It does not. It does not refer derogatorily to anyone.

Mr. McNARY. Does it mention any member of the Sen-

Mr. ROBINSON. It mentions the junior Senator from New York [Mr. Wagner], but not in an offensive way.

If any Senator objects to it I shall withdraw the request and read it.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, in the absence of my colleague, the junior Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER], I respectfully request the Senator from Arkansas to withhold his request.

Mr. ROBINSON. Very well; I withdraw the request. The VICE PRESIDENT. The request is withdrawn.

THE COAL CODE

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter from the Builders' Supply Corporation to Mr. L. J. Martin, acting regional director, compliance council, N. R. A., in reference to the coal code.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PENDING FEDERAL LEGISLATION-ADDRESS BY BENJAMIN C. MARSH

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have published in the RECORD a radio address delivered by Benjamin C. Marsh, executive secretary of the People's Lobby, in Washington, D. C., on February 9 last, relating to pending legislation in Congress.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Last summer I was in three countries with dictatorships, Germany, Poland, and Russia, and in no one of them I am certain, could a citizen talk over the radio, and probably not privately safely, as I shall talk today. I am glad that radio systems in America are not subject to Government censorship, which is involved in Government ownership, though speakers properly are subject to libel laws, and should be held accountable for the truth of what they say. I sincerely hope we stay America.

No administration measure before Congress will materially affect the unemployment situation, since unemployment is primarily due to maldistribution of the national income, and the Federal Government must act to correct that.

In considering pending and prospective legislation, and needed

In considering pending and prospective legislation, and needed legislation we must remember that we are in the fifth year of the depression, with practically no improvement except that due to Government spending through borrowing from the investing classes, and taxing people of small means.

It is clear that if many, perhaps most, of the employable unemployed, are to be employed, the Federal Government will have to employ them, because private capital wants high profits before it will give work.

We are confronted with an economic fact, not the new deal theory, that the masses can fatten on the crumbs that fall from the tables of the masters of finance, industry, and land, including natural resources

The people's lobby is therefore working for socialization of ground rent, through taxation of natural resources, and monopolies, and of basic industries, paying the owners only a minimum fair price and a minimum rate of return. We are also working Federal housing corporation and a Federal marketing corporation.

The measures now before Congress in which the masses of the people are probably most immediately interested, are those providing for social security. The administration's so-called "security bill, the Wagner-Lewis-Doughton bill," is misnamed. It makes a minimum provision for old-age pensions. The total Federal appropriation for the next fiscal year for this purpose is about $50,-00,000, and for each succeeding year $125,000,000, although the President's committee on economic security admits that if an allowance of $25 per month for the aged over 65 years were provided, this would "represent a claim upon current national production of $2,000,000,000 per year." The States are supposed to contribute half of this cost. This committee of the President's also reports that "at least one-half of the approximately 7,500,000 people over 65 years now living are dependent."

The administration bill makes a minimum provision for mothers' assistance, child welfare, public health, etc., but doesn't establish a Federal unemployment insurance system, leaving it up to the States to do this if they wish, and provides a minimum Federal appropriation for payment of unemployment insurance benefits of about $5,000,000 for the next fiscal year, and $50,000,000 in succeeding years. Counting only 10,000,000 unemployed—the number is probably nearly 12,000,000—this would amount to a Federal appropriation of 50 cents per unemployed next year and $5 thereafter. The bill can only be designated as "the insecurity bill for evading the responsibility for meeting the unemployment situaappropriation of 50 cents per unemployed next year and $5 thereafter. The bill can only be designated as "the insecurity bill for evading the responsibility for meeting the unemployment situation."

The Lundeen security bill sets up a national unemploymentinsurance system in the Department of Labor and stipulates that during the entire time of unemployment people shall be paid a minimum of $10 a week for each, and $3 for each dependent, but that the pay shall always be the prevalling rate of wages. It is stipulated that the cost shall be met by taxes on inheritance, gifts, individual, and corporation incomes of $5,000 a year and over, and corporation surpluses. Compensation for disability because of maternity is to be paid to women for 8 weeks before and 8 weeks after childbirth. This bill has the backing of scores of labor, farm, and tenant organizations. It is a much saner program than the Townsend $200-a-month-pension sales-tax scheme.

No citizen, however, is any safer than the economic system of his country, and our economic system is chock full of dynamite.

The fight over the nearly $5,000,000,000 bill, of which $4,000,000,000 is to be for public works and $880,000,000 for relief, promises to continue for some time. Neither in the proposed bill nor in the N. I. R. A is there any provision that the cost of improvements shall be assessed upon property benefited thereby, although many cities and States have such provision. A bill is being drafted, and will be introduced probably shortly, for a Federal excise tax on the privilege of holding land, based upon the value with an exemption of at least $3,000, so that no additional tax would be levied upon small-home owners, city or farm.

A bill will also probably be introduced shortly creating a Federal Housing Corporation with power to acquire land at a reasonable price, and if necessary to secure fair prices, to commandeer or to construct plants manufacturing material necessary for housing, there has been practically no housing through Federal action state Commerce, has introduced a resolution authorizing his committee to investigate the financial set-up and capitalization of the railroads of the United States, which states that not only the investing public, but the Government itself has already invested billions of dollars in the railroads and railways, and their vested billions of dollars in the railroads and railways, and their vested billions of dollars in the railroads and railways, and their affiliated and subsidiary companies. He will also introduce shortly a bill for public ownership of the railroads under strict Government control. Senator Wheeler's resolution for an investigation of the capital set-up of the railroads is of basic importance since public ownership on the basis of present capitalization of mines, oil fields, railroads, steel, aluminum, and other basic industries, would be merely subsidy of wildcat financing, which would be paid by consumers. At the close of 1929, the alleged assets of reporting corporations were in round figures $335,000,000,000.

This was at least $150,000,000,000 too high, but at the close of 1932 the assets were still reported as approximately $280,000,000,000, so that only about a third of the water has been squeezed out, and much of the program of the new deal is designed to out, and much of the program of the new deal is designed to validate this fictitious valuation at the expense of the consumer. Since about one-third of 1 percent of the families of America receive at least one-fifth of all dividends paid on the stock of domestic corporations, and there are only about 2½ million sizable teached to the behavior that the least one-fifth of the consumer. stockholders, it is obvious that validating watered stock is not going to help consumers nor recovery.

The Wheeler-Rayburn resolution to investigate holding companies is very important.

The opponents of the Hastings-Pierce bill, legalizing the dis The opponents of the hastings-rierce bill, legalizing the dissemination in interstate commerce to qualified medical persons of information on birth control, claim that it is unethical, and undesirable. The advocates of the bill point out that in most advanced countries such information is legal, and that we are paying hundreds of millions of dollars a year for maintenance of children whose parents cannot maintain them, and that the bill only removes discrimination against the poor, since the wealthy can get the information anyhow. There are about 7,500,000 children in families on relief.

Senator Guffer, of Pennsylvania, has introduced a bill, sponsored by the United Mine Workers, to have the Federal Government control production, prices, and labor relations in the bituminous-coal industry. It creates a national bituminous-coal commission, and requires all producers to subject themselves to Government control. The report of the Noticeal Resources Records. mission, and requires all producers to subject themselves to Government control. The report of the National Resources Board on mineral resources, indicates why we are not getting along toward recovery. It recommends:

"1. That the Federal Government assist the mineral industries to attain economic stability, in order that they may minimize waste of natural resources, maintain reasonable wage standards, and protect investments."

The Government cannot protect alleged investments or even actual investments in natural resources, and protect the consumers actual investments in natural resources, and protect the consumers of America, since about 5 percent of the people own nearly four-fifths of the wealth. The Government will have to socialize the four competing natural resources—coal, oil, water power, and gas. We have asked Secretary Ickes to draft a bill to do this.

The new deal is attempting to do the impossible in its task of protecting property interests and jollying the propertyless. The report points out, however, that as far as land and natural resources are concerned, "Basically absolute ownership still resides in the State (either individual Commonwealth or Nation), and under the State (either individual Commonwealth or Nation), and under the police power the State may constrain the private use of land within bounds set by the public interest." The enforcement of this legal provision will help solve the problem, but the administration has evaded it. We cannot have real economic planning with private ownership of natural resources.

Revenue revision has not been undertaken by the House Ways and Means Committee, but must be, since the present rate of increase in the public debt for a year or two will seriously impair the Government's credit. The Government is still borrowing from the investing classes, largely the well-to-do, for reasons which no decent citizen likes to contemplate. With about half our wealth and income, Great Britain raises nearly twice as much from corporation and individual income taxes as we, which means that we could raise four times as much, in addition to getting a large amount for several years from liquid corporation surpluses which could raise four times as much, in addition to getting a large amount for several years from liquid corporation surpluses, which amount to many billions of dollars. Only a vigorous demand from the American people will bring such taxation. There is strong sentiment in both branches of Congress to tax America's wealth as British wealth is taxed. We cannot borrow ourselves out of the depression. Total dividend and interest payments for the 5 years of the depression were $10,000,000,000 greater than for the 5 years before the depression, according to the New York Journal of Commerce, the figures, respectively, being $36,000,000,000 and $26,000,000,000. The administration is attempting to save the propertied classes, borrow from them, and tax those of small property or none, and with small and precarious incomes, to pay the carrying charges on money borrowed from the rich. This is not only unjust but unsound. Congress, however, can initiate higher taxes on incomes, estates, corporations, and tax land speculation. It will do it if the people demand it. people demand it.

Not one of the banking bills before Congress goes to the root of the credit issue, providing credit for consumption instead of stabilizing property values. I cannot even say that a banking and credit bill to put the credit facilities of the Nation at the disposal of consumers will get much of a hearing. How could it when the administration is devoting its major efforts to protecting property owners and turning the cold shoulder on producers and consumers with the implied but not expressed slogan, After us the deluge?

STREET-CAR SUBWAYS IN THE DISTRICT

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a very interesting radio address by W. A. Roberts, people's counsel of the District of Columbia, delivered February 16, summarizing the necessity for constructing subways to bypass street-car traffic in the city of Washington.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Although surrounded by major national issues, the 700,000 resi

Although surrounded by major national issues, the 700,000 residents of Washington and vicinity are thinking and talking about local traffic conditions. It has become quite customary for a Government employee to spend over an hour reaching his office from his home located only a few miles away.

The use of private automobiles is no solution as in the past year there were registered over 180,000 vehicles, Nation-high density, all striving and scrambling for the limited parking area on public space or suffering over high charges in the equally limited private parking areas. For a period of 5 years the rate of increase in registrations has been approximately 20 percent, and there is no reason to believe that the tendency in this direction, if not artificially restrained, will otherwise terminate. By successive steps the District authorities have restricted the amount of curb space ncially restrained, will otherwise terminate. By successive steps the District authorities have restricted the amount of curb space available for even short-time parking until it is practically impossible for the customers of down-town merchants to approach the stores without paying parking charges. Although this tendency has been resisted it is apparent that an even broader program than parking restriction must be undertaken in the immediate future to reduce congestion on the few available north and south arteries.

Through the milling motor vehicles the street cars, driven by power obtained through underground track construction, move slowly and noisily. Running time is being constantly increased and traffic hazards create interruptions in service which are exasperating to the patrons and expensive to the company. Constant criticism of the vehicle drivers is the only reply to a growing undercurrent of criticism on the part of the patrons. It is no undercurrent of criticism on the part of the patrons. It is no longer convincing. It is true that a small proportion of the peakhour crowds approach their work on foot, but this is a varying number depending on weather conditions and is largely transferred to mass transportation units in times of storm, adding to the congestion.

Nearly 4,000 light automobiles are engaged in taxicab service. Nearly 4,000 light automobiles are engaged in taxicab service. They are run largely by rental drivers who must earn a definite sum for expenses before obtaining anything for themselves. Theoretically, many of these vehicles are being purchased on conditional sales contracts, but in practice the tremendous mileage which must be covered under the zone rates in order to earn even a moderate wage exhausts the useful life of the vehicle before payment is completed and requires that it be traded on a new car. The turn-over in the ranks of these drivers is enormous. Generally they are said to average 35 trips per day, which, with the number of vehicles in service, would be the equivalent of a total of somewhat less than 140,000 trips. Only a small number of these trips are run during the rush periods as a very considerable number of the vehicles are employed for the long hauls in competition with the mass transportation and cannot return in time to obtain additional patronage. Recent surveys indicate that this type of operation of taxicabs has developed cruising to a fine art and on certain very congested thoroughfares the number of empty cabs seeking patrons amounts to 60 or more percent of the total number of vehicles being operated. Obviously, no substantial additional service can be afforded by taxicabs, for even at the relatively low rates in effect they are too expensive for everyday transportation by a great majority of the population whose income averages well under $2,000 per annum.

In addition to the Government clerical workers, numbering even a moderate wage exhausts the useful life of the vehicle before

In addition to the Government clerical workers, numbering now over 100,000, there is a resident population of over 120,000 Negroes. Twenty-five thousand family units of this Negro population have been recently on the relief rolls. Quite obviously they cannot resort either to private cars or to taxicab service. The universal weekly pass system has tremendously increased the number of trips made by car-riding patrons. A considerable part of this increase has occurred in rush-hour travel and the present units of the street-railway system are jammed to ultimate capacity during these periods.

Not only is the patronage on the existing equipment at its maximum but expert studies have shown that the capacity of the tracks carrying this equipment has reached its limit. Minor changes of the track connections as a result of the rerouting hearings is expected to even the flow of street cars and effect a measure of improvement. Nobody contends, however, that the improvement will be of such extent as would permit marked acceleration of the present schedules and it is universally conceded that any considerable further increase in patronage will ceded that any considerable further increase in patronage will find the street-car operation unbearably unsatisfactory.

One factor in this problem frequently overlooked is the destruction of the value of business properties as a result of the noise of surface cars, particularly the heavy type of equipment in present use. The financial position of the transportation company does not warrant the belief that any material substitution of improved equipment is imminent. The principal advantage of the more modern types is rapid acceleration and braking and higher average speeds. The full effect of such improvements cannot be experienced if the new cars must be run between the relatively obsolete equipment now in operation. Increasing traffic requires the addition of equipment more than the substitution of improved equipment.

It is not intended to draw too gloomy a picture of our trans-

It is not intended to draw too gloomy a picture of our transportation problem. The genuine undercurrent of sentiment is far more antagonistic than the sober thoughts here expressed. Throughout the city the mass of the population has reached a point of exasperation reflected in constant petitions from dvic and other organizations and the vigorous, if unheard, comment of the individual citizens. There is but one solution, that is, the transfer of the present street-railway equipment to routes which will more directly approach their desired destinations and which will avoid conflict with the motor-vehicle traffic. This cannot be accomplished on the surface. Washington will not tolerate unsightly elevated structures and there is but one remaining level—beneath the surface.

Approached in this fashion, the problem is susceptible of dis-It is not intended to draw too gloomy a picture of our trans-

Approached in this fashion, the problem is susceptible of dispassionate analysis. One does not reject an imperative solution merely because of expense or because of its novelty. If we must have subways, the sensible thing to do is to prepare for their coming by scientific study which will prevent mistakes in location and construction and which will avoid excessive or unnecessary costs. Tentatively, let us consider a routing which would intercept street-car traffic north of Dupont Circle on Connecticut Avenue and street-car traffic north of Dupont Circle on Connecticut Avenue and proceed underground to the south along this avenue and Seventeenth Street to the vicinity of D Street NW. Another branch would intercept the street cars north of Thomas Circle and proceed south along Fourteenth Street to E Street NW. The east-and-west tube would be entered in the vicinity of Fourth and E Streets, pass parallel to the shopping centers into Pennsylvania Avenue and the north quarter of the Government triangle and thence to the south of the White House to Twenty-first Street NW in the general line of E Street. A surface line would enter the subway from Twenty-first Street and offer a connection with the Georgetown-Pennsylvania Avenue lines now existing. Admittedly this construction, which would aggregate about 4 miles in length, would struction, which would aggregate about 4 miles in length, would permit the by-passing of a large percentage of the rush-hour operation. It would relieve two of the principal north and south arteries of street cars at the point of greatest traffic density and would protect the street cars themselves against interruptions to service by traffic lights and growing motor-vehicle traffic. The number of stops could be substantially reduced to the benefit of the average

The maximum estimate of the cost of this construction, including adequate stations, is approximately $12,000,000, but slightly more than the cost of the Arlington Memorial Bridge and only a fraction of the cost of some of the monumental structures now housing Government departments. Conservative estimates state that nearly 70 percent of the total cost of construction of subways would be expended on labor and materials—a decided inducement toward present construction. This latter feature renders the project particularly attractive for the use of emergency funds.

There is great danger of confusing the issue by a premature discussion of finances. Even if it be granted that the additional traffic induced by the subway operation will not and cannot liquidate the investment there are offsetting credits of major im-The city is immediately confronted with traffic-control portance. The city is immediately confronted with trainc-control measures which must include the construction of new arteries and the widening of existing thoroughfares at a cost reaching into millions of dollars. Subway construction will defer such expenditure for many years by inducing traffic to use mass transportation and leave at home the private vehicle which is wasteful of space. No part of the immediate program above outlined need be wasted. With little expense it could be converted to rapid-transit service when the tubes are, as they must be extended toward the suburwhen the tubes are, as they must be, extended toward the suburban Maryland areas. The enhancement in commercial values because of more ready approach and the reduction in noise and congestion would supply a material tax offset as a result of the increase in the assessment basis on real property. More important than any of these financial factors is the saving of time and nervous energy of tens of thousands of persons now obliged to fight traffic on the way to their employment.

It should be mentioned that a major responsibility for this project lies on the Federal Government because of the arbitrary refusal of the planners of the triangle area to leave open normal approach to this focal point of traffic. The consolidation of all Government departments in the Mall section is a prime cause of traffic congestion and the development of the "rectangle program" in the vicinity of Nineteenth and E Streets will but add to the difficulty by duplicating the points which were the recently because the recent of the second by case. in the vicinity of Nineteenth and E Streets will but add to the difficulty by duplicating the points which must be reached by each unit of mass transportation. Washington being voteless and without means of affirmatively expressing its sentiment must rely on the patience and industry of its legislators in Congress to anticipate and meet its municipal requirements. The construction of subways is such an issue and the sooner it is frankly faced and an adequate appropriation made for technical study under unbiased guidance, the sooner relief from the present traffic difficulty will be possible.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 380 of the act entitled "An act to establish a Code of Law for the District of Columbia", approved March 3, 1901, as amended (D. C. Code, title 29, sec. 288), is amended to read as follows:

SEC. 5. Section 955 of such act, as amended (D. C. Code, title 25, sec. 246), is amended to read as follows:

simple in lands, tenements, or hereditaments in the District of Columbia, of an intestate, are all in the same degree of kindred to the intestate, they shall take per capita or by persons; and, where a part of them are dead and a part living, the issue of those dead shall take per stirpes or by stocks the shares of their deceased

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I should like to have an explanation of the provisions of this bill, and of its effect on existing law.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, this bill, which was submitted by the corporation counsel at the request of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, has received considerable attention at the hands of the committee.

The report submitted states the object of the bill. Under existing law, property goes first to the children. If none. the descent of the property is governed by the manner in which it came to the intestate. If the estate descended to the intestate on the part of his father, it then follows the paternal line, keeping always to the next lineal male paternal ancestor and his descendants; if there be none such, then to the maternal ancestor and her line.

If the estate descended to the intestate from his mother. the property then follows the line of the male maternal ancestors and descendants; and if there be none, then to the father and his paternal ancestors.

If the estate was acquired by the intestate by any manner other than the above-mentioned, the property goes to his brothers and sisters of the whole blood and then of the half blood; and if there be none such, then to the father; and if no father is living, then to the mother; and if no mother is living, then to the grandfather, and so on.

The pending bill would entirely destroy the distinction existing in the present law between the male and female ancestors or descendants. Thus, it would place fathers and mothers, brothers and sisters, grandmothers and grandfathers on an equal footing, and so forth. At the same time, it wipes out any distinction between property which descended from the paternal line and that which descended from the maternal line. It provides, therefore, that if there be no child or descendant, the whole property shall go to the father and mother in equal shares; if there be no father and mother, then to the brothers and sisters and their descendants equally; and if there be no brother or sister or descendant, then the whole shall go to the widow or widower. If there be none such, then the estate shall be divided between the paternal and the maternal kindred, going first to the grandfather and the grandmother equally, then to the uncles and aunts equally.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 1266) for the relief of Robert E. Masters was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

LILLIAN G. FROST

The bill (S. 312) for the relief of Lillian G. Frost was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Lillian G. Frost, mother of Franklin Blaine Frost, late vice consul and third secretary, Department of State, the sum of $3,500, being one year's salary of her deceased son, who died while in the Foreign Service; and there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, a sufficient sum to carry out the purpose of this act.

CREDITORS OF DRAINAGE DISTRICTS IN BANKRUPTCY PROCEEDINGS

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1425) to amend section 80 of chapter 9 of an act to amend the act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States", approved July 1, 1898, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 80 of chapter 9 of an act to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States", approved July 1, 1898, and acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto, be, and the same is hereby, amended by adding at the end of subsection (a) the following: "Provided, That where the creditors of a drainage district are three or less in number, the court may receive a petition and determine the issues involved, as in the case where a petition is filed with the consent of 30 per centum of the creditors of a drainage district."

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Indiana [Mr. Van Nuys], who reported the bill, please explain it?

Mr. VAN NUYS. Mr. President, this proposed amendment to the Bankruptcy Act is designed to cure a situation in the State of South Carolina. In that State there is a drainage district of which there is only one creditor; and in order that the one creditor may have the same status as 30 percent of the creditors under the old act, this amendment is proposed.

Mr. KING. It is not general legislation, so to speak?

Mr. VAN NUYS. No.

Mr. KING. I have no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ALASKA-BRITISH COLUMBIA HIGHWAY

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1374) authorizing the survey, location, and construction of a highway to connect the northwestern part of continental United States with British Columbia, Yukon Territory, and the Territory of Alaska, which had been reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations, with amendments.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, this is a bill of considerable importance. I suggest that the author of the bill explain its provisions. I will state that I have had an opportunity of studying the bill in the Committee on Foreign Relations, and I favor it; but I think the measure is of sufficient consequence to justify an explanation to the Senate.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I am very happy to conform to the suggestion made by the Senator from Arkansas.

The bill is an important one; but its provisions are simple. It simply authorizes the President to negotiate with the Government of the Dominion of Canada for the location and survey of a road from the northwestern section of the United States through British Columbia to Yukon Territory and to the Territory of Alaska. This survey is contemplated, and the proposal has met with the favor of the Department of State and the Bureau of Roads. It is one link in an American highway which will lead from Alaska to Buenos Aires in South America.

The Senator from Arkansas will recall, as will other members of the Senate, that 2 years ago a provision was carried in an appropriation bill to make a survey for a road from the southern part of Texas to Panama. Last year's appropriation bill carried an appropriation of $75,000 for a survey from Panama to Buenos Aires in South America. This is one of the links contemplated to be built in this country.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CLARK in the chair). Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. McNARY.

Mr. McKELLAR. May I ask the Senator if the bill contemplates the building by the Canadian Government of the part of the road in Canada, or what is the proposal? I have not had time to read the bill.

Mr. McNARY. The bill merely authorizes and empowers the President of the United States, acting through the Department of State, to enter into negotiations for the location and survey of a road from the northwestern section of the United States through British Columbia to Yukon Territory and the Territory of Alaska.

Mr. McKELLAR. About how far will the road run through British Columbia?

Mr. McNARY. It is 2,460 miles from Seattle to the Yukon Territory and Alaska. There is a provision in the bill that none of this money may be expended unless and as a condition precedent Canada enters into negotiations for the survey and construction of the road. There is a provision authorizing an appropriation of $100,000 for the purpose of making the survey. The bill has received the approval of the Bureau of Roads of the Department of Agriculture, of the Secretary of State, and the unanimous approval of the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. KING. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. McNARY. I yield.

Mr. KING. I should like to make an inquiry of the Senator. I may say that I have no objection to the appropriation of $100,000, but in view of the contingencies-first, that there must be an agreement between the two governments. and perhaps other contingencies-what is the necessity for our making an authorization at the present time?

Mr. McNARY. The authorization for the construction of our portion of the road to Alaska is contingent upon an agreement upon the part of the Dominion of Canada to construct the road through British Columbia. The survey will not be made until it is agreeable to the Dominion of Canada. It is conditioned also upon that consideration; but if the agreement shall be entered into, as we all know it will be, the Government of the United States desires to have available the money to carry on its part of this task.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator believe that the agreement will be entered into in the near future?

Mr. McNARY. From advice I have, which I think is reliable, and from authority which I believe to be creditable, it is my belief that the agreement to make the survey will be entered into during the summer.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will pardon me, in his time, I have had a great deal of reluctance in voting for measures which authorize large appropriations, particularly where the expenditures depend upon certain contingencies. If the agreement should be negotiated, and it should become apparent that the road would be beneficial and should be constructed, doubtless Congress would make the necessary appropriation.

Mr. McNARY. I suggest to the Senator that the bill carries only an authorization, and no money may be expended out of the Treasury of the United States unless this agreement shall be entered into between the United States and the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. KING. Of course, as the Senator knows, an authorization too often is regarded as a moral if not a legal obliga-

Mr. McNARY. Yes; but, as the Senator said a moment ago, if this great undertaking should be authorized, he would not want to withhold the appropriation of the money. I cannot conceive anything more wonderful in the development of Canada, more scenic and more useful, than a road from the northern part of the United States through British Columbia into the Territory of Alaska.

Mr. KING. I agree entirely with the Senator.

Mr. McNARY. Very well. Then I am proceeding in the way which conforms to the practice of this body, namely, for an authorization, a survey, and then later an appropriation, for which, however, I am not asking at this time.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. McNARY. I do.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator from Oregon will permit me. I call the attention of the Senator from Utah to the

That no money shall be appropriated pursuant to the authorization contained in this section until the agreement or agreements provided for in section 1 have been entered into.

I think that safeguards the matter.

Mr. McNARY. Unquestionably.

Mr. McKELLAR. This money is to be expended in Alaska, and therefore there is no danger in making the appropria-

Mr. McNARY. I appreciate the statement of the Senator from Tennessee. I thought I made the matter clear. I will add that last year a substantially similar bill passed this body, but it did not have this saving clause. That is the difference between the bill as it passed last year and the pending bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the committee will be stated.

The amendment was, on page 1, line 3, after the word "is", to strike out "empowered and directed" and insert "requested", so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States is requested, through such channels as he may deem proper, to negotiate and enter into an agreement or agreements between the negotiate and enter into an agreement or agreements between the Governments of the United States and of the Dominion of Canada, for the survey, location, and construction of a highway to connect the Pacific northwestern part of continental United States with British Columbia and Yukon Territory, in the Dominion of Canada, and the Territory of Alaska; in cooperation with the Government of the Dominion of Canada to cause a survey or surveys to be made to determine the most practicable route for such highway, as well as specifications and estimates of the probable cost thereof, and plans for financing its construction and maintenance.

SEC. 2. The President is hereby authorized, upon the conclusion of the negotiations and the execution of the agreement or agree-ments herein authorized, to designate such existing agency of the Government of the United States as he may select for this pur-Government of the United States as he may select for this purpose, or such officials or agency as he may specially appoint or create for the purposes of this act, to carry on the work of survey and location of the route for such highway, and of the construction thereof after such route shall have been determined and approved by the President. And such agency or officials, so designated or appointed by the President hereunder, shall be, and they are hereby, authorized and empowered to communicate directly with a like agency or officials to be appointed by the Government of the Dominion of Canada, for the purpose of coordinating and expediting the work of such survey, location, and construction of such highway.

expediting the work of such survey, location, and construction of such highway.

SEC. 3. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated the sum of $100,000 for carrying on such negotiations and for making such surveys, locations, plans, and specifications; this sum, when appropriated, to remain continuously available until expended.

SEC. 4. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated the further sum of $2,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be expended under the direction of the President, through such agency as the President may designate hereunder, for the construction of the road or roads, within the Territory of Alaska, to connect the existing road system in the Territory, Dominion of Canada: Provided, That no money shall be appropriated pursuant to the authorization contained in this section until the agreement or agreements provided for in section 1 have been entered into.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PROMOTIONS IN THE ARMY

The bill (S. 1404) to promote the efficiency of national defense was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. I ask that that bill go over.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, may I make a brief statement before the bill goes over?

Mr. KING. Yes; I withhold the objection.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Or account of the importance of this bill, a bill changing the system of promotions in the Army, I realize that it cannot be properly considered at the present time; but I wish to say to the Senate that since 1926 we have been struggling with the matter of a fair system of promotions in the Army. The present conditions are intolerable. Under them, men are in the grade of first lieutenant today who became first lieutenants in 1920, and who may remain in that grade until they retire for age, unless some change is made. The present situation is perilous to the efficiency and welfare of the Army. The Senate Committee on Military Affairs believes that this bill presents a system which will establish a better flow of promotions. The bill will be explained in detail when the Calendar is taken up under rule VIII at a later day.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, just a word.

We have had a number of promotion bills both in the Army and in the Navy, and upon each occasion it has been represented that both the Army and the Navy were in a condition of collapse, so to speak, and that the various promotion bills were indispensable to the preservation of the morale both of the Army and of the Navy. Just as soon as these measures were passed, however, complaints came—at least they came to me by the score—of the injustices wrought by the various bills to which I have referred. Many persons claim that the bills have been discriminatory, that they have been unfair and unjust, and that too much authority has been given to some officer or to some board. It seems to me that if now we have a perfect bill, the committee is to be congratulated; but in the meantime I think we ought to have an opportunity to study it.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I wish to interject here the statement that the very conditions to which the Senator refers have prevented us from getting through a promotion bill for the Army. We have passed bills for promotion in the Navy and in the Marine Corps, but on account of the objections of various elements, we have been unable so far to pass any bill for promotions in the Army.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection being made, the bill will be passed over.

DENIS HEALY

The bill (S. 879) for the relief of Denis Healy was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon persons honorably discharged from the United States Navy Denis Healy shall be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the United States Navy on the 23d day of December 1902: Provided, That no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

RAY FUNCANNON

The bill (S. 878) for the relief of Ray Funcannon was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon persons honorably discharged from the United States Navy Ray Funcannon shall be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the United States Navy on the 28th day of May 1926: Provided, That no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

BURIALS IN NATIONAL CEMETERIES

The bill (S. 1712) to amend section 4878 of the United States Revised Statutes, as amended, relating to burials in national cemeteries, was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 4878 of the United States Revised Statutes, as amended, be further amended by adding at the end of said section a new sentence reading as follows: "Persons who were members of the Cabinet of the President of the United States at any time during the period between April 6, 1917, and November 11, 1918, may be buried in any national cemetery: Provided, That the interment is without cost to the United States."

WAR-TIME RANK TO RETIRED OFFICERS

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 927) to amend the act entitled "An act to give war-time rank to retired officers and former officers of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, and/or Coast Guard of the United States", approved June 21, 1930, so as to give class B officers of the Army benefits of such act, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 1 of the act entitled "An act to give war-time rank to retired officers and former officers of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, and/or Coast Guard of the United States", approved June 21, 1930, is amended by striking cut the words "except those retired under the provisions of section 24 (b) of the act of June 4, 1920."

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I will ask the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs to make an explanation of the bill.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, the act of June 21, 1930, proposed to be amended by this bill, gives war-time rank, without pay, to retired officers and former officers of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, and Coast Guard who served during the World War, except those retired under the provisions of section 24 (b) of the National Defense Act.

Investigation shows that there are 26 officers of the Army who were honorably retired under section 24 (b), whose retirement was not due to misconduct, neglect, or avoidable habits, who would benefit by this proposed legislation. They were simply overlooked in the other measure.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CLARK in the chair). The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN CARMICHAEL WILLIAMS

The bill (S. 1082) for the reinstatement of John Carmichael Williams in the United States Navy was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that bill go over.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to direct the training and attendance of personnel and animals of the Regular Army as participants in the Eleventh Olympic Games: Provided, That all expenses incident to training, attendance, and participation in the Eleventh Olympic Games, including the use of such supplies, material, and equipment as in the opinion of the Secretary of War may be necessary, may be charged to the appropriations for the support of the Army: Provided further, That applicable allowances which are or may be fixed by law or regulations for participation in other military activities shall not be exceeded.

Be it enacted, etc., That the President is authorized to present Distinguished Flying Crosses to Air Marshal Italo Balbo and Gen. Aldo Pellegrini, of the Royal Italian Air Force, in recognition of their formation flight with 24 seaplanes to the United States and back to Italy, which was an event of national importance, a great aeronautical achievement, and a mark of good will between Italy and the United States.

ROBERT H. WILDER

The bill (S. 894) for the relief of Robert H. Wilder, was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enatced, etc., That in the administration of the benefits and privileges of the Emergency Officers' Retirement Act of May 24, 1928 (45 Stat. 735), the service performed in France subsequent to August 1, 1917, by Robert H. Wilder while a member of the Veterans Corps of Artillery of the State of New York shall be held to have been performed as an emergency officer in the grade of captain: Provided, That no back pay, compensation, benefit, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

AMENDMENT OF BANKRUPTCY ACT

The bill (S. 84) to amend section 61 of the act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States", approved July 1, 1898, relating to depositories for money of bankrupt estates, was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 61 of the act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States", approved July 1, 1898, as amended and supplemented, is amended by inserting before the period at the end thereof a semicolon and the following: "except that no bond shall be required to be given by any such depository which is entitled to the benefits of section 12 (b) of the Federal Reserve Act with respect to any deposits of such money to the extent that such deposits are insured under such section."

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 213) to amend section 113 of the Criminal Code of March 4, 1909 (35 Stat. 1109, U. S. C., title 18, sec. 203), and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I should like to have the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. Logan], who reported the bill, or some other Senator who is familiar with the bill, to explain it.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I should be very glad to explain the bill, but I believe it is of such controversial nature that we could hardly dispose of it at this time, so I ask that

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

PICKWICK LANDING DAM

The bill (S. 1506) to change the name of the Pickwick Landing Dam to Quin Dam was announced as next in order. Mr. McKELLAR. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

EDGAR JOSEPH CASEY

The bill (S. 876) for the relief of Edgar Joseph Casey was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon persons honorably dis-charged from the United States Navy Edgar Joseph Casey shall be charged from the United States Navy Eagar Joseph Casey shall be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the United States Navy on the 1st day of September 1925: Provided, That no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

FILLING OF VACANCIES IN JUDGESHIPS

The bill (S. 481) authorizing the filling of vacancies in certain judgeships, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, this is not a bill to create new or additional judgeships. It will be remembered that by the act of September 14, 1922, Congress created certain additional district judgeships, and the act also provided that when any of the new judges departed this life, resigned, or retired the vacancy should not be filled, except in certain

The act also provided for a judicial conference, to be presided over by the Chief Justice of the United States, the conference to be composed of the senior circuit judges in the various circuits.

The conference has recommended that certain of the existing judgeships thus created should be continued. The Committee on the Judiciary considered the matter, in part adopted the recommendation of the judicial conference, and urges the removal of the existing restrictions on the appointing of successors to certain of these judges, as follows: 2 in the district of Massachusetts; 2 in the southern district of New York; 1 in the eastern district of New York; 1 in the western district of Pennsylvania; 1 in the eastern district of Michigan; 1 in the eastern district of Missouri; 1 in the western district of Missouri; 1 in the northern district of Ohio; 1 in the southern district of California; I in the district of Minnesota; I in the district of Arizona; I in the northern district of Texas; 1 in the southern district of Iowa.

It costs the Government about $300 to pass a bill, and as these judges depart this life, or retire, or resign, a bill would, of course, be immediately introduced to create a new judgeship, and there is an expense of $300 to the Government for each such bill that passes the Congress.

The bill before us is recommended, I repeat, by the judicial conference, this being the second time the conference has recommended it. Likewise, it is recommended by the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate, except that the committee adds the district in Arizona, the southern district in Iowa, and the northern district in Texas.

The measure creates no new judgeships; it simply removes the restrictions, so that in the event any of the judges in the districts referred to should retire, resign, or depart this life the President could fill the vacancy. It does not, I repeat, create additional judgeships.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, does the Senator happen to be familiar with the fact that the situation in some of the districts is extremely acute?

Mr. ASHURST. That is correct.

Mr. CLARK. A district judge in Minnesota who is eligible to retire next month is in very bad health, and desires to retire, and I was told this morning by the presiding judge in that circuit that unless provision is made for filling that vacancy during the present session of Congress, before an act could possibly be passed in the next session the district would be hopelessly behind in its business.

Mr. ASHURST. That is true. Mr. KING. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DUFFY in the chair). Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield.

Mr. KING. Perhaps the statement I was about to make in the nature of an inquiry would be rather in conflict with the suggestion made by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK].

I recall that a number of years ago President Harding recommended the creation of a large number of new judicial districts-27, as I recall, or the creation of 27 or 28 new judgeships. The appeal was then made that because of the prohibition law it was imperative that we should have additional judges. Since that time the eighteenth amendment and the Volstead Act have been repealed, and the courts do not now have before them the police cases they formerly had.

The appeal then made resulted in at least a partial response to the request of the President, and later additional judges were appointed. I ask the Senator, in view of the fact that some of these judgeships were created under that hysteria, whether, in the event the judges should die, there would be any necessity for the continuation of the positions?

I should rather have the Government create a judgeship, or create a position calling for the appointment of a judge. when the occasion arises, rather than have a sort of omnibus bill which would reach to an indefinite date in the future.

Mr. ASHURST. Let me say, in reply to my able friend, in whose time I am speaking-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Arizona has expired.

Mr. KING. I should be glad to have the Senator reply in my time.

Mr. ASHURST. Twenty-four district judgeships were created at the time to which my able friend referred. This bill proposes the continuation of 15 thereof.

It may be true that the Federal courts are not cluttered with prohibition cases as they were when these judgeships were created, but it is also true that the Federal business has expanded by more than 40 to 60 percent owing to the increase in population and the vast number of laws passed by Congress, many of which apparently raise Federal ques-

Let me say to my able friend from Utah, because I might as well give him now what will be to him unpleasant news, that while this bill does not create additional judgeships, a bill is before the Committee on the Judiciary, of which the Senator from Utah is one of the most learned members, proposing to create some additional judgeships, and whilst I am among those who usually resist the creation of new Federal offices, if the judicial department of this Government is to function, there must be some additional district judges.

This bill does not create any additional judgeships. Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ASHURST. I have exhausted my time. I have been speaking through the courtesy of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. CLARK. Then I take the floor in my own right for the purpose of making merely one observation.

I am advised that less than 3 percent of the criminal cases in the Federal courts, not only prohibition cases, but all criminal cases, result in jury trials. Of course, every lawyer in this body is familiar with the fact that it is the jury trials which take the time of the Federal courts.

I believe this is a meritorious bill. I am not familiar with all the districts included in it, but I know that in the two dstricts included in the State of Missouri for many years we have had two very active, conscientious, industrious judges, each of them working to the limit of his capacity, trying cases every day during the season in which the court is in session, and yet those courts are now far behind in their dockets. I do not believe it is possible in the districts taken as a whole in which these so-called "temporary judgeships" are to be created, to reduce the number! without very great hardship on litigants and very great detriment to the public service.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, in my time I should like to ask the Senator from Arizona a question. He asserted, as I understand, that this bill does not create any new judgeships. Is that correct?

Mr. ASHURST. It is not the intention of this bill to create additional judgeships.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I notice in the bill there is provided "one in the eastern district of Michigan." May I inquire of the Senator whether that does not recreate a judgeship which is not at present in existence?

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator is technically correct. Let me read what the Judicial Conference, September session, 1934, presided over by Mr. Chief Justice Hughes, said, as appears on page 2 of the report accompanying the bill:

As stated by the conference in its report of last year, the importance of making appropriate provision for the filling of such vacancies, before the vacancies actually arise, is shown by the situation in the eastern district of Michigan—

To which the able Senator from Michigan referred-one of the judgeships above mentioned. That judgeship was held by Judge Simons, and on his appointment as circuit judge there was no provision for filling the vacancy in the district court in the eastern district of Michigan.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The bill proposes to restore a fourth.

Mr. ASHURST. To revive or to restore.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I have no disposition to resist the bill, because I know there is need for relief, but I regret that the Senator's committee has not reported the resolution to which I have called its attention repeatedly, calling for a survey and report from the Department of Justice as to whether this is the best way to relieve the congestion or whether it would not be better, all things considered, to create a third district in the State.

Mr. ASHURST. Let me say to the able Senator, as I said to the able Senator from Utah [Mr. King], there will be within a fortnight a bill creating additional judgeships as a result of a survey made by your committee and by the Department of Justice. It is the scope and purport of this bill simply to remove restrictions so that when a vacancy occurs the unfortunate situation that took place in Michigan and in the southern district of New York will not again occur.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I think the Senator misses my point. If this fourth judgeship is recreated, there certainly is no possibility of creating an additional district in the State. The problem is, Should this judgeship be recreated or should a new district be created?

Mr. ASHURST. The Department of Justice is of opinion that this would be the most eligible way to do that.

Mr. VANDENBERG. May I ask the Senator if one of these days he will be good enough to bring my resolution to the floor so the Senate may act on it?

Mr. ASHURST. I always listen with attention and respect to the able Senator from Michigan, as I am sure all other Members of the Senate do. We will report the resolution soon. Whether favorably or unfavorably, we will at least report.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, in view of the fact that we shall have the bill before the Judiciary Committee in the near future, I shall object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CLARK in the chair). Objection is heard. The bill will be passed over.

The clerk will state the next order of business on the

PUBLICATION OF WRITINGS OF GEORGE WASHINGTON

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 140) to provide for the completion of the publication of the Writings of George Washington was announced as next in order.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I wish to avail myself of this opportunity to talk about the bill that was objected to by the in some places for trying to assist in the relief of some of the Federal courts; undoubtedly that is true; but have we ever thought of the proposition that we were going to be compelled to create a great many more judicial districts and enlarge the Federal judiciary? The able chairman of the committee has just stated that in a short time a bill will come before us for the purpose of accomplishing that result.

We created a number of Federal judgeships because of the Prohibition Act, and it was said just as soon as we got rid of that law we will be relieved from all these judges.

Now we have repealed the Prohibition Act, and the demand for more judges goes on with increased vehemence. We do not realize that there is constantly a desire for more litigation. Lawsuits which used to take an hour now take a week. The expense of a lawsuit in any Federal court which used to be $100 is now $1,000. And when we pass a bill here we never know whether it is a valid law or not until judges pass on it.

If we undertake to take away from the Federal courts some of their jurisdiction-for instance, in the issuing of injunctions—we realize where we will get. I have repeatedly called the attention of the Senate to actual cases of lawsuits arising in Federal courts over State statutes where there is not any Federal question involved, but where $3,000 are involved, and one of the parties is a corporation or an individual who has incorporated his business or lives in a different State from that where the suit is pending. Corporations are formed in other States for the purpose of giving the Federal court jurisdiction.

So this is only the beginning. We are going to pass this bill; we are going to pass many more bills increasing the number of Federal judges, increasing their jurisdiction. lengthening the time that it takes to try suits, increasing the expense, multiplying it at least by 5 or 6. We might just as well close our eyes and accept the situation. We will have to do it, because it can easily be shown in any case where an additional judge is wanted that the present judge is not able to attend to the business and must have assistance. Why delay? Why not pass all these bills, and then probably we will have a reason to abolish Congress. The courts have the last say anyway; why not let them have the whole say?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, a word respecting the statement of my learned friend from Nebraska. The bill he was discussing does not propose to create additional Federal judges. This bill, I repeat, proposes simply, solely, and only to remove the restrictions from 15 of the Federal judgeships created in 1922.

It is trite for me to say that justice delayed is justice denied. I hold no brief for the Federal courts, but I do say their calendars are cluttered, particularly in these districts where they are seeking new judges, and if we were to fail to perpetuate these judgeships we would find out all too soon, litigation piling enormously high and citizens denied justice.

I do not desire to be importunate, but I invoke the shade of Coke, of Kent, of Blackstone, and Marshall and hope that my able friend from Utah, who himself has been a distinguished judge, will see the necessity for removing restrictions on these judgeships, and let the bill pass.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will say to the Senator from Arizona that objection was made to the bill: that the next order of business on the calendar was announced, and the Senate is now considering House Joint Resolution 140, to provide for the completion of the publication of the writings of George Washington.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I am urging my friend from Utah [Mr. King] to withdraw his objection.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, in my time I will ask the able Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] if he will state for the convenience of myself and other Senators what are the restrictions on the filling of judicial vacancies which this bill is designed to remove?

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, in 1922 additional district judgeships were created. The bill provided that if those Senator from Utah [Mr. King]. There is undoubtedly reason | Judges departed this life or resigned, that office was functus officio, evaporated, and that there was no judgeship and no successor. The judicial conference is of the opinion that in the case of the 15 judgeships named in the bill, the restrictions should be removed so that the President may fill a vacancy.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Was the original law intended in large measure to create new judgeships in order to handle liquor cases?

Mr. ASHURST. The cluttering of the Federal calendars owing to prohibition was one of the reasons which induced Congress to pass the bill in 1922 creating the additional judgeships. The able Senator from Utah says that prohibition is gone and we do not have the calendars cluttered with that business, but I ask Senators to remember the expanding, the increasing growth of the population and litigation

Surely we may not, in a cavalier way, say that one of the branches of our Government, the judicial branch, shall not have the means to carry out the spirit and purpose of the Constitution.

I hope the bill will pass.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of Order of Business No. 133, being House Joint Resolution No. 140?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, is that the bill to which I objected?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That bill was passed over. The Senate has now before it House Joint Resolution No. 140, to provide for the completion of the publication of the writings of George Washington.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I avail myself of the opportunity while the Senate has under consideration the measure to which the Chair just referred to make a very brief response to my dear friend from Arizona [Mr. Ashurst]. It causes me more grief, may I say, to object to anything that my friend from Arizona wants than to object to any request by any other Senator. We have worked together for years in the Judiciary Committee. I have the highest regard for his intellectual honesty, for his great ability, and for his sincerity in the discharge of the heavy responsibilities resting upon him as chairman of that important committee; but, Mr. President, I cannot be persuaded by his eloquent appeals to yield at the present time.

I do not agree with my dear friend that the necessity for so many of these judges exists, notwithstanding we have passed many bills we ought not to have passed. In the case of the English courts—and I do not wish to disparage our own judiciary—we find that a judge there will dispose in 1 day of more cases than some of our judges dispose of in a week or 2 weeks. Only a few years ago in the great State of Indiana, where there was only one Federal judge, but a man of ability industry, and courage, he transacted all the business that came before the Federal court in that great Commonwealth and never asked for any assistance. In my own State, where there is considerable litigation, we have an able judge who came from Tennessee, and who had been a judge there for many years. He not only discharges all the responsibilities resting upon him in the State of Utah but he is frequently called into other States to render judicial service.

In view of the fact that we are to have, as my able friend says, before us in a short time a bill to create additional judges, and, with my present views, I shall oppose that bill—it seems to me we can pretermit further consideration of this bill until we take up the other measure.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of House Joint Resolution 140?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 140) to provide for the completion of the publication of the writings of George Washington, which had been reported from the Committee on the Library with amendments.

The first amendment was in section 2, page 1, line 11, after "Sec. 2", to strike out "The position of Executive Director of the George Washington Bicentennial Commission, which expired on December 31, 1934, is hereby reestablished, without compensation, to be filled by appointment by the President. The Executive Director is authorized to "; and to insert "The former Director of the George Washington Bicentennial Commission, without receiving any compensation therefor, shall"; in line 15, after the word "employ", to strike out "and compensate"; in line 17, after the word "procure", to strike out "and pay"; and in line 18, after the word "obligations", to strike out "for personnel authorized by this section ", so as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. The former Director of the George Washington Bicentennial Commission, without receiving any compensation therefor, shall (a) complete the preparation of the manuscript for, and provide for the printing and binding of, the remaining unpublished volumes of such writings; (b) distribute that portion of the undistributed sets of such writings required by law to be distributed by the Commission; (c) dispose, in such manner as in his judgment will best serve the purposes for which the George Washington Bicentennial Commission was created, of such other educational material possessed by the Commission as is not required by law to be distributed in a definite way; (d) employ assistants (not to exceed five in number) in the same manner as the Commission was authorized to procure personnel; and (e) incur obligations for such miscellaneous expenses as may be necessary and/or incident to the administration of this joint resolution and for the printing and binding authorized by section 1.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, beginning in line 23, to strike out section 3, as follows:

SEC. 3. For the payment of personnel and for miscellaneous expenses, there is authorized to be made available not to exceed $14,000 from the unobligated balance of the appropriation available to the Commission on December 31, 1934. And from such sum, when made available, payments are authorized to be made for uncompensated services rendered since December 31, 1934, in connection with the purposes of this joint resolution.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

Sec. 3. For personal services, including services rendered since December 31, 1934, travel and necessary miscellaneous expenses, in connection with the purposes of this joint resolution, there is hereby appropriated, from any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, $35,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, section 4, line 11, after "Sec. 4", to strike out "obligations authorized to be incurred and payments authorized to be made" and to insert "Payments authorized"; in line 13, after the word "be", to strike out "paid" and insert "made"; and in line 14, after the word "Department", to strike out "upon vouchers approved by the Executive Director", so as to make the section read:

SEC. 4. Payments authorized under the provisions of this joint resolution shall be made by the Division of Disbursement, Treasury Department.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the joint resolution to be read a third time.

The joint resolution was read the third time and passed.

WASHINGTON-LINCOLN MEMORIAL-GETTYSBURG BOULEVARD

The Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 43) for the establishment of a commission for the construction of a Washington-Lincoln Memorial-Gettysburg Boulevard connecting the present Lincoln Memorial in the city of Washington with the battlefield of Gettysburg in the State of Pennsylvania, which had been reported from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, with an amendment in section 6, page 3, line 14, after the word "before", to insert "one year after the date of enactment of this resolution", so as to make the joint resolution read:

Resolved, etc., That there is hereby established a commission to be known as the United States Commission for the construction of a Washington-Lincoln Memorial-Gettysburg Boulevard connecting the present Lincoln Memorial in the city of Washington with the battlefield of Gettysburg in the State of Pennsylvania (hereinafter referred to as the Commission), and to be composed of 10 commissioners, as follows: The President of the United States; Presiding Officer of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and the president of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, ex officio; 2 persons to be appointed by the President of the United States; 1 Senator from the State of Maryland and 1 Senator from the State of Pennsylvania, to be appointed by the President pro tempore of the Senate; and 1 Representatives from the State of Maryland and 1 from the State of Pennsylvania, to be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives. The Commissioners shall serve without compensation and shall select a chairman from among their number.

Sec. 2. That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $10,000, to be expended by the Commission in accordance with the provisions of this resolution.

Sec. 3. That it shall be the duty of the Commission to prepare a plan or plans to further commemorate the public services of George Washington and Abraham Lincoln by the construction of a boulevard or highway connecting the present Lincoln Memorial and the Washington Monument in the city of Washington with the Gettysburg battlefield in the State of Pennsylvania; and to give due and proper consideration to any plan or plans which may be submitted to it.

SEC. 4. That the Commission, after selecting a chairman and a vice chairman from among its members, may employ a secretary and such other assistants as may be needed for clerical work con-nected with the duties of the Commission and may also engage the services of expert advisers, and may fix their respective com-the services of expert advisers, and may fix their respective compensations within the amount appropriated for such purposes.

SEC. 5. That the Commissioners shall be paid their actual and necessary traveling, hotel, and other expenses incurred in the discharge of their duties out of the amount appropriated.

SEC. 6. That the Commission shall on or before 1 year after the date of enactment of this resolution, make a report to the Congress, in order that enabling legislation may be enacted.

SEC. 7. That the term of Commission hereby created shall expire within 1 year after the completion of the proposed boulevard pire within 1 year after the completion of the proposed boulevard or highway. SEC. 8. This joint resolution shall take effect immediately.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FEES IN DISTRICT RECORDER OF DEEDS OFFICE

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 410) to provide fees to be charged by the recorder of deeds of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with amendments.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I inquire if this bill reduces the fees that are at present being charged?

Mr. KING. No. It increases them, because there is a deficit, and an examination shows that the fees are too small. I may say that the bill, which was introduced originally by myself at the request of the recorder of deeds, contains some inequalities. The measure was referred to the Commissioners and to the corporation counsel of the District of Columbia, and after very careful examination they have suggested a number of amendments.

Mr. ROBINSON. It is noted that the amendments proposed by the committee reduce by approximately 50 percent, in many instances, the fees which were provided for in the original bill.

Mr. KING. Yes; but in the original bill some of the fees called for an increase of 300 percent over the existing charges, and on examination it was found that that was too extreme an increase. The bill as it is now framed is the result of careful consideration by the corporation counsel and the Commissioners.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I may say, too, that this matter has been considered two or three times by the Appropriations Committee when the District of Columbia appropriation bill has been under consideration, and we have heard testimony at various times also from members of the bar and others who are interested, suggesting that the change proposed by this bill be made in order that the office might be made self-supporting.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments reported by the committee will be stated.

The first amendment was, on page 1, line 9, after the word "less", to strike out "$1.50, and 25" and insert "$1, and 20", so as to make the clause read:

SEC. 552. Fees: The legal fees for the services of the recorder shall be as follows:

"For filing, recording, and indexing, or for making certified copy of any instrument containing 200 words or less, $1, and 20 cents for each additional hundred words, to be collected at the time of filing, or when the copy is made."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, line 3, after the word "date", to strike out "$1, and 25" and to insert "50 cents, and 15", so as to make the clause read:

For searching records extending back 2 years or less next preceding current date, 50 cents, and 15 cents for each additional year, to be paid by the party for whom the search may be made.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, line 6, after the word "survey", to strike out "30" and insert "20", so as to make the clause read:

For recording a plat or survey, 20 cents for each course such survey may contain.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, after the word "such", at the end of line 13, to strike out "$2.50" and insert "$1.50", so as to make the clause read:

For filing and indexing a bill of sale of chattels, or a mortgage or deed of trust thereof, or a conditional bill of sale of chattels or any release or satisfaction of any such, $1.50.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was on page 2, line 16, after the word "office", to strike out "$1" and insert "50 cents", so as to make the clause read:

For filing and indexing any other paper required by law to be filed in his office, 50 cents.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, line 20, before the word "cents", to strike out "80" and insert "50", so as to make the clause read:

In addition to the fees herein required, all corporations hereafter incorporated in the District of Columbia shall pay to the recorder of deeds at the time of the filing of the certificate of incorporation 50 cents on each thousand dollars of the amount of capital stock of the corporation as set forth in its said certificate:

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INCLUSION OF LIVESTOCK GROWERS IN BANKRUPTCY ACT

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1616) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States", approved July 1, 1898, and acts amendatory and supplementary thereto, which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with an amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, this bill proposes an amendment to the general bankruptcy law. I think the Senate should have an explanation of the effect of the amendment which is proposed.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, this proposed amendment to the Bankruptcy Act is designed merely to place livestock grazers on the same footing with farmers. In the district court of Nevada the Federal judge held that where the term "farmers" was used in the Bankruptcy Act it did not include the grower or raiser of livestock. It was my thought that the word "farmer" was sufficient to include one engaged in raising livestock, but the court held otherwise. This bill merely places cattle and sheep growers on the same footing with farmers.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator-I was a little disturbed by the noise in the Chamber—does this proposed amendment to the Bankruptcy Act contemplate that the word "farmer" shall be construed so as to include stockmen?

Mr. HATCH. Yes.

Mr. McNARY. Is that the sole purpose of the proposed amendment?

Yes; that is its sole purpose. Mr. HATCH.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment reported by the committee will be stated.

The amendment reported by the committee was in section 2, page 2, line 5, after the word "means", to strike out "" the words"; so as to make the section read:

Sec. 2. That subsection (r) of section 75 of the act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States", approved July 1, 1898, as amended and supplemented, is amended by inserting after the words "the term 'farmer' means any raiser of livestock or."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JAMES FOY

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 271) for the relief of James Foy, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged sailors James Foy, late of the United States Navy, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been discharged under honorable conditions from the naval service of the United States as a member of that organization on the 8th day of May 1922: Provided, That no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Ohio for an explanation of the bill? I note that the report of the Navy Department is adverse.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, it is customary for the Navy Department to report adversely on bills of this character. This man, however, had three honorable discharges from the Navy, though his last discharge was not honorable. He served through the whole period of the World War, had an honorable discharge from that service, and the committee felt, as I feel, that he ought to have the benefit of an honorable discharge now.

Mr. KING. When he received this dishonorable discharge was it for conduct so reprehensible as to make it unwise and unfair to pass a measure of this kind?

Mr. BULKLEY. I think not.

Mr. KING. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

OHIO RIVER BRIDGE, ROCKPORT, IND.

EMMETT C. NOXON

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 42) for the relief of Emmett C. Noxon, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment to add at the end of the bill a proviso, so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Emmett C. Noxon, of Johnstown, N. Y., the sum of $1,000. Such sum represents the amount of fine paid by Emmett C. Noxon, pursuant to a conviction for violating certain provisions of the Lever Act of August 10, 1917, as amended, prior to the declaration by the Supreme Court of the United States of the unconstitutionality of such provisions: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. ## WILLIAM KEMPER

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 282) for the relief of William Kemper, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims, with amendments, on page 1, line 4, after the name "Kemper", insert "out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated"; in line 5, after the words "sum of", to strike out "$1,204" and insert "$600"; and at the beginning of line 6 to strike out "as reimbursement" and insert "in full settlement of all claims against the Government", so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay to William Kemper out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated the sum of $600 in full settlement of all claims against the Government for expenses incurred incident to injuries sustained by his son, Irwin Kemper, a minor, in an accident involving a United States mail truck, March 21, 1932.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INTERNATIONAL MANUFACTURERS' SALES CO. OF AMERICA, INC.

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1126) for the relief of the International Manufacturers' Sales Co. of America, Inc., A. S. Postnikoff, trustee, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with amendments.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, this is an important bill in the sense that it appropriates a large sum. I should like to hear an explanation of it.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, let me say to the Senator from Arkansas that the Committee on Claims gave considerable hearing and extended consideration to this bill before it reported it last year. It finally reduced the claim, as it thought was justified by the evidence before it, to an appropriation amounting, I think, to $658,000.

I might say that, as I recall, the Committee on Claims of

I might say that, as I recall, the Committee on Claims of the House of Representatives has three times reported this bill favorably for a larger amount. The record is rather long, and the report goes extensively into all the questions involved.

The International Manufacturers' Sales Co. had shipped a large consignment of shoes to Russia. It was necessary for the consignment to go by way of Vladivostock, I think, in view of the fact that the Bolsheviks had closed the usual routes of trade.

About that time President Wilson issued an order by which he created a War Trade Board which was to develop trade with the Government of Russia. It had a representative at Vladivostock. When the shoes of the International Manufacturers' Sales Co. arrived there they could not be delivered, and a representative of the State Department or the War Trade Board took charge of them with the consent of the owners, though with some hesitancy on their part. The owners were preparing to ship the shoes back to the United States, but they were distributed in Russia; the money was collected and placed in banks. While the collection was going on, and before the International Manufacturers' Sales Co. could secure the money from the banks, the President of the United States and the Federal Reserve Board issued an embargo against the Russian rubles and would not allow the banks to exchange them for any other money.

The International Manufacturers' Sales Corporation then took the matter up with the Department of State and with every other agency they could resort to, but they never could find anyone who was able to grant them any relief. Then they came to Congress. As I have said, the matter has been considered very gravely by the committee of the House and the committee of the Senate, and it was the conclusion of the Senate committee that this concern lost its shoes, or their value, solely on account of the action of the President of the United States and the Federal Reserve Board after the company had been requested to turn the shoes over to the War Trade Commission and had done so under the suggestion of the President.

As a result the company lost the shoes, and before it could get its money the President issued an order, without any notice to the company. It had no notice whatever of what was going to be done until it went to collect its money. It lost not only all its money but it lost all its shoes. Instead of giving them the full value of the shoes, it was decided that they should determine the value of the shoes and deduct therefrom what it would have cost to ship them back to the United States. The claim was originally nearly $1,000,000. The reduction brought it down to $658,000.

A similar matter was before Congress last year—I am speaking from memory—involving a sugar contract which had been entered into during the war. By reason of some orders of the departments in Washington the price of sugar was affected to such an extent that a concern which had entered into the contract lost a vast sum of money, several million dollars, and Congress appropriated to make up that loss.

I can only say to the Senator from Arkansas in response to his request that I gave much time personally to the consideration of the claim because it was referred to me as chairman of the subcommittee.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. LOGAN. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. Does the amount which the committee allowed reimburse merely for the value of the shoes at the time they were sold?

Mr. LOGAN. It reimburses for their value in the warehouse at Vladivostok at the time they were taken. The claimant, of course, is very much dissatisfied with the bill as reported, being of the opinion that it is entitled to the full value of the shoes, the amount of money for which they were sold, when that amount of money was placed in the banks in Russia. It seems that they were expecting to return the shoes to the United States and it was difficult to trace just what had happened in Russia. It seemed that it would be doing justice if we considered the loss as the value of the shoes in Vladivostok less the cost of returning them to the United States. The Senator from Kentucky, who is now speaking, has not the slightest doubt in the world that under all laws of justice and equity the bill ought to pass.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator what became of the money that was in the bank?

Mr. LOGAN. It was all confiscated and went up in smoke. The Russian Government changed and the money was lost.

Mr. FLETCHER. The contractor got nothing from the shoes?

Mr. LOGAN. Not a thing.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments reported by the committee will be stated.

The amendments were, on page 1, line 7, to strike out "$968,748.12" and insert in lieu thereof "$658,050"; and on page 2, at the end of the bill, to insert a proviso so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the International Manufacturers' Sales Co. of America, Inc., A. S. Postnikoff, trustee, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $658,050 in full settlement for losses sustained by the said International Manufacturers' Sales Co. of America, Inc., during the years 1918 and 1919 while engaged, at the invitation of the United States Government, in furnishing articles of necessity to the Siberian population of Russia under and in pursuance to the plan formulated by the War Trade Board in the fall of the year 1918 for extending economic aid to the Siberian population of Russia, said losses having been incurred through the inability of the said International Manufacturers' Sales Co. of America, Inc., to exchange the Russian rubles received from the sale of said articles of prime necessity into American dollars because of the regulation issued by the Federal Reserve Board under date of February 14, 1919, under authority of the Executive order of January 26, 1918, prohibiting the exportation or importation of Russian rubles or the transfer of funds for their purchase by persons or dealers in the United States: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding

E. T. Seltzer, crashed into the automobile owned by said Stefano Talanco, which was parked on the Castroville Road, Bexar County, Tex., and in which said Stefano Talanco and Edith Talanco were sitting at the time of such collision, such sum representing (1) $2,000 for permanent personal injuries suffered by said Stefano Talanco, and (2) $7,500 for personal injuries suffered by said Edith Talanco: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. ### JOHN Z. LOWE

The bill (S. 1298) for the relief of John Z. Lowe, was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Comptroller General of the United States is authorized and directed to credit the accounts of Jchn Z. #### ECONOMIC CONDITION OF AGRICULTURAL PRODUCERS

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 9) authorizing the Federal Trade Commission to make an investigation with respect to agricultural income and the financial and economic condition of agricultural producers generally, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over until we may have an opportunity to study it more carefully.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be passed over.

Mr. WHEELER subsequently said: Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate return to the consideration of Order of Business 148, being Senate Joint Resolution 9, authorizing the Federal Trade Commission to make an investigation with respect to agricultural income and the financial and economic condition of agricultural producers generally.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Arkansas [Mr Robinson] is interested in this matter, but he is not on the floor at the moment. With the understanding that if he shall desire, when he returns, to move to reconsider, and that the measure may go back on the calendar, I shall have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Montana?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, when this joint resolution came before the Senate in the orderly reading of the calendar, the Senator from Utah [Mr. King] asked that it go over, in the absence of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER].

Mr. KING. Mr. President, let me say that the Senator from Arkansas, before he left the Chamber, evinced some interest in the measure and that is the reason why I made the suggestion.

Mr. WHEELER. Permit me to say to the Senator from Oregon that this joint resolution passed the Senate at the last session. It failed of passage in the closing hours of the House of Representatives. It got into the jam in the last few minutes of the session around 11 or 12 o'clock and failed of passage.

Mr. McNARY. Permit me to say to the Senator that I have no objection to the purpose of the joint resolution. I only thought it wise to ask the Senator from Arkansas if he had any objection to it. Personally, I favor the measure.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Montana?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 9) authorizing the Federal Trade Commission to make an investigation with respect to agricultural income and the financial and economic condition of agricultural producers generally, which had been reported from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry with an amendment on page 3, line 10, after the word "corporation", to strike out "and other manufacturers, warehousemen, and/or processors of the principal farm products", and to insert in lieu thereof the words "engaged in the sale, manufacturing, warehousing, and/or processing of the principal farm products and of the other principal sellers, manufacturers, warehousemen, and/or processors of the principal farm products", so as to make the paragraph read:

(2) The extent of the increases or decreases in recent years in the income of the principal corporations engaged in the sale, manufacturing, warehousing, and/or processing of the principal farm products, and of the other principal sellers, manufacturers, warehousemen, and/or processors of the principal farm products, as compared with the decline in agricultural income, including the amount and percentage of such changes; and

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section 5, on page 7, line 5, to strike out "$50,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$150,000" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 5. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $150,000, which shall be available for expenditure, as the Federal Trade Commission may direct, for expenses and all necessary disbursements, including salaries, in carrying out this resolution and prosecuting litigation necessary in aid of the powers conferred hereunder.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

WEST INDIA OIL CO.

The bill (S. 1039) authorizing the adjustment of the claim of the West India Oil Co. was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Comptroller General of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to settle and adjust the claim of the West India Oil Co., for the rescue at sea of Pvts. Solomon H. Churchill and John J. Callahan, members of Battery B, First Coast Artillery, Fort Randolph, Canal Zone, and to allow, in full and final settlement of said claim, an amount not in excess of $123.33. An appropriation of $123.33, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby made from any funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated for payment of the claim.

DR. GEORGE W. RITCHEY

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1036) authorizing adjustment of the claim of Dr. George W. Ritchey, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Comptroller General of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to adjust and settle the claim of Dr. George W. Ritchey in the amount of $8,283.39 as loss sustained through the spalling and splitting of the original 40-inch mirror which was intended for installation under contract NOd-297, dated June 5, 1931, in a telescope at the United States Naval Observatory, and to allow not to exceed $8,283.39 in full and final settlement of said claim. There is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $8,283.39, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for payment of the claim.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Washington [Mr. Schwellenbach] explain the bill?

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, this is a bill which makes an adjustment with Dr. Ritchey, who is a scientist and astronomer. He entered into a contract with the Government to make for the Government a new telescope which was to be twice as large as any telescope which had been previously manufactured. During the building of the telescope one of the lenses broke, and it cost him the amount of the claim to replace it. The claim has the approval of the Comptroller General purely upon the basis of justice and equity, with the idea of paying the scientist a reasonable compensation. He worked for 3 years exclusively upon this task. He has no legal claim against the Government. The Comptroller General said:

There is no legal liability on the United States under the contract for the loss sustained by Dr. Ritchey in the spalling or splitting of the first mirror. Under the contract it was the legal obligation of Dr. Ritchey to construct the telescope in accordance with the terms of the contract, even though one or more mirrors may have become worthless because of internal stresses and strains, or otherwise. However, it is believed that there are equities in this matter which deserve the consideration of the Congress. It is reported the telescope is the largest of its kind ever constructed. It was known to be experimental in character at the time the contract was entered into, though the administrative officers of the Navy Department, as well as Dr. Ritchey, appear not to have anticipated that one of the large mirrors would develop such internal stresses and strains as to render it useless after it had been purchased and delivered in this country.

Mr. KING. What was the contract price?

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. The contract price was $76,000.

Mr. KING. Was he paid the full $76,000 for his 3 years' work?

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. No. He actually got $5,600 for the 3 years' work. The purpose of the bill is to make up to him what the Comptroller General felt was a reasonable compensation to a man who is reputed to be the outstanding scientist in his field in the world. The Comptroller General did not feel that it was fair to ask him to work on the basis of less than $2,000 a year. The bill would raise his compensation to the basis of $5,600 a year.

I will say frankly to the Senator that when I presented the matter I was not very enthusiastic about the claim. However, other members of the Claims Committee inform me that it was not uncommon, where new matters were handled by the Government which were experimental in their nature and losses were sustained, to compensate those who sustained the losses because of the experimental nature of the work.

Mr. KING. I am curious to ascertain what became of the difference between the $5,600 which the Senator says the scientist received and the $76,000.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. The $5,600 is the profit he made on his contract after 3 years' work.

Mr. KING. What does the Senator mean to state because of the difference between the $5,600 and the $76,000?

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. He received $76,000. It cost $76,000 less $5,600 for materials and supplies. He received no compensation in the way of salary. The $5,600 was the difference between the amount he received and the actual cost to him for material and supplies.

Mr. KING. I shall not object, but it is rather a dangerous precedent to establish that men having contracts with the Government, the Government living up to the contract, may claim additional compensation because of some unforeseen contingency.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. I appreciate the Senator's position. However, according to the record the telescope is the largest which has ever been built and was purely experimental in its nature.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DINO CARBONELL

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1325) for the relief of Dino Carbonell, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment to add a proviso at the end of the bill, so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Dino Carbonell, a resident of Italy, or his duly authorized representative, the sum of $500, representing the amount of a United States Treasury bond (3 percent Treasury bond of 1951–55, serial no. 22346-F) deposited by him with the immigration authorities of the port of New York, N. Y., as security for a bond executed by him and conditioned upon his departure from the United States on or before June 15, 1932, such bond being subsequently forfeited, although such Dino Carbonell departed from the United States within the period fixed in such bond, as extended by such immigration authorities: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary not-withstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOE G. BAKER

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 747) for the relief of Joe G. Baker, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That notwithstanding the provisions and limitations of sections 15 to 20, both inclusive, of the act entitled "An act to provide compensation for employees of the United States suffering injuries while in the performance of their duties, and for other purposes", approved September 7, 1916, as amended, the United States Employees' Compensation Commission is hereby authorized and directed to receive and consider, when filed, the claim of Joe G. Baker, of Gas City, Ind., for disability alleged to have been incurred by him on the 6th day of August 1931 while in the employment of the Veterans' Administration Hospital at Marion, Ind., and to determine said claim upon its merits: Provided, That no benefits shall be held to have accrued by reason of this act, prior to its passage.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to have an explanation of that bill.

Mr. VAN NUYS. Mr. President, this is a bill to authorize the United States Employees' Compensation Commission to consider the merits of this claim. The claimant was a civil employee of the Veterans' Administration hospital at Marion, Ind. By reason of his physicial condition he failed to file notice of claim within the 1 year's time provided in the statute. The only way by which the Commission may consider the claim is through the direction and authorization of the bill. The sole purpose of the bill is to give this civil employee his day in court.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator tell us when the alleged injury occurred? I know we have had a number of applications here where the alleged injury occurred 15 or 20 years ago.

Mr. VAN NUYS. It occurred in 1931.

Mr. KING. I have no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MRS. GEORGE F. FREEMAN

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 475) for the relief of Mrs. George F. Freeman, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, on page 1, line 11, after "1930," to strike out "as a result of "and insert "and whose death is alleged to have resulted from ", so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the requirements of section 15 to 20, both inclusive, of the act entitled "An act to provide compensation for employees of the United States suffering injuries while in the performance of their duties, and for other purposes", approved September 7, 1916, as amended, are hereby waived in the case of the late Dr. George F. Freeman, formerly employed by the Department of Agriculture as director of the Agriculture Experiment Station, Mayaguez, P. R., who died on September 16, 1930, and whose death is alleged to have resulted from injuries sustained in the course of such employment, and the United States Employees' Compensation Commission is authorized and directed to consider and act upon any claim which may be filed with such Commission by Mrs. George F. Freeman, widow of such Dr. George F. Freeman, within 1 year from the date of enactment of this act, for compensation under the provisions of such act of September 7, 1916, as amended, for the death of such Dr. George F. Freeman; but compensation, if any, shall be paid from and after the date of enactment of this act. Such payments of compensation shall be made out of funds heretofore or hereafter appropriated for the payment of awards under the provisions of such act, as amended. payment of awards under the provisions of such act, as amended.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 170) for the relief of Alva A. Murphy was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. I should like an explanation of that bill, Mr. President

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah asks for an explanation of the bill. [A pause.]

Mr. KING. Let it go over.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the Germania Catering Co., Inc., the sum of $5,000. Such sum represents the amount of fine paid by the Germania Catering Co., Inc., pursuant to a conviction for violating certain provisions of the Lever Act of August 10, 1917, as amended, prior to the declaration by the Supreme Court of the United States of the unconstitutionality of such provisions.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, let us have an explanation of Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, the bill is to afford relief in the case of a fine which was paid in the Port of New York. An identical bill was passed by the Senate at the last session of Congress, and favorably reported to the House. The Acting Attorney General says that similar measures have been approved, and says there is no objection to the passage of this bill.

Mr. KING. Does the claim grow out of the so-called "Lever Act"?

Mr. COPELAND. Yes.

Mr. KING. Which was held to be unconstitutional, and taxes were paid in the belief that it was constitutional?

Mr. COPELAND. That is correct.
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. KING. I have no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FIDELITY TRUST CO. OF BALTIMORE, MD., AND OTHERS

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 694) for the payment of the claims of the Fidelity Trust Co. of Balti-more, Md., and others, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to receive, consider, and adjudicate claims for refund of the bankers' special tax paid under the acts of June 13, 1898, and October 22, 1914, in view of the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Fidelity and Deposit Co. against United States (259 U. S. 296), and United States against Fidelity and Deposit Co. (266 U. S. 587), and in accordance with the agreement made March 3, 1925, between the Attorney General and the Secretary of the Treasury as a basis for settlement of such claims: Provided, That no claim shall be considered which is filed later than 6 months after the passage of this act.
SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not other-wise appropriated, to such claimants any amount due and allowed in the determination of any such claims which shall have been presented in accordance with this act.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I ask for an explanation of the bill.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, an identical bill passed the Senate at the last session, and was reported to the House. Some years ago a bill was enacted by Congress imposing a special tax on banks, as the Senator from Utah will recall, and it applied also to trust companies and others engaged in the banking business. The Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of United States against The Fidelity and Deposit Co., which, if my recollection is correct, is reported in Two Hundred and Fifty-ninth United States Reports, held that act unconstitutional. The banks and trust companies and others interested took up the matter with the Treasury Department, and in one way or the other an agreement was reached that the money should be refunded. Of course it should be refunded.

It appears, however, that all the institutions did not have notice, or did not get in within the life of the agreement that had been worked out; and a bill was introduced by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. Typings] to take care of two cases from Maryland. The Committee on Claims, however, realizing that there were quite a number of these claims outstanding-probably 5 percent of the whole number of cases involved-struck out the entire subject matter of the bill, and made this a Federal bill to authorize the refund of all the taxes that had been paid by any of the banks. I think such tax payments are still outstanding in the case of about 50 banks, involving perhaps a million dollars, or such a matter; but it is money that was collected illegally, and the financial institutions which paid it in are, of course, entitled to have it returned. Otherwise, we shall have refunded the money in about 95 percent of the cases, while about 5 percent of the institutions have not had refunds made to them.

Bills have been passed from time to time-just driblets of bills coming in-until the committee thought we would cover the whole matter and pay all the others. I think there are some 50 of them.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. LOGAN. Yes.

Mr. KING. I do not object to giving the claimants their day in court; but does not the Senator think it is rather unwise to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to make payment without the Congress, knowing what are the amounts involved?

Mr. LOGAN. The amount is in the record.
Mr. KING. There is no limitation in the bill on the amount which the Secretary may expend. It may be $1,000,000, it may be $5,000,000.

Mr. LOGAN. Let me say to the Senator from Utah that whatever the amount may be, it is shown by the records in the Bureau of Internal Revenue; and all the claimants are entitled to is a refund of the amount which they paid in, without interest. It would be exceedingly difficult for any individual Senator-particularly one like the Senator from Kentucky, who has no interest whatever in the matter—to spend several months in the Treasury Department trying to find out what the amount is; but it is the sum which they paid in, and which it was afterward declared by the Supreme Court they should not have paid.

I think the bill ought to be passed.

Mr. KING. Let me reply to the Senator that the protagonists of the bill could very easily have ascertained from the Treasury Department the amounts to which they are respectively entitled, if they are entitled to anything, and those amounts could have been stated in the bill.

Mr. LOGAN. That is perfectly true; but there are a number of others, perhaps some scattered around, who are not here; and if we do not pass this bill, we shall have other bills coming in to enable them to get their money back. Besides that, an honest government ought not to keep money or desire to keep money that was dishonestly taken from its citizens.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SOUTHERN PRODUCTS CO.

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 929) for the relief of the Southern Products Co., which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the Southern Products Co., Dallas, Tex., the sum of $13.051.19 in full settlement of all claims against the Government, for the cost of removal and of the cost of reconditioning 9,097 bales of good, merchantable cotton, from its place of storage in the Bush Terminal Co. Warehouse, Brooklyn, N. Y., the damages being caused to the cotton by climatic and other causes during its enforced removal and while it was exposed to the weather after removal from the Bush Terminal Warehouse, Brooklyn, N. Y., as result of the commandeering the entire storage warehouse on January 3, 1918, by the Secretary of War: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like an explanation of Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, the bill was introduced by the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. Sheppard]. The matter is somewhat complicated, but I believe I can briefly give the Senator the facts.

The claim grew out of events that happened during the war. The Southern Products Co. had a large quantity of cotton-somewhere between nine and ten thousand bales of cotton-consigned to the Bush Terminal Co., of New York. The cotton was placed in the warehouses of the Bush Terminal Co. At that time the Government, or some of its departments, commandeered the warehouse for use during the war. Then it gave notice to the Southern Products Co., as well as to all others, to remove their cotton. The Southern Products Co. removed its cotton at a cost of something more than $13,000, which it would not have incurred if the warehouse had not been commandeered by the Government. It also cost the company some four or five thousand dollars to recondition the cotton; and there were other damages which brought the total claim up to about $31,000.

This claim was filed with the Board created in the War | Department, known as the "Board of Contract Adjustment."

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon me? The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. LOGAN. I do. Mr. KING. This claim seems to have been considered by the Court of Claims of the United States.

Mr. LOGAN. I have not reached that yet. The claim has been all around. It has been about a good deal.

The Board of Contract Adjustment found that the company had actually expended thirteen thousand and some odd dollars in the removal of the cotton, and first held that it was entitled to be paid that sum by the Treasury of the United States. Then, on a review by the War Department Claims Board, it was held that under the provisions of the law the Treasury could not pay for anything unless it was property taken, and as this was not property taken it could not be paid for; neither could the damage to it be paid for.

Then the Southern Products Co. filed its claim in the Court of Claims. The Court of Claims held that it had no jurisdiction to consider the matter; that it had no jurisdiction under the Dent Act, nor did it have any jurisdiction under the Lever Act, and that it could not grant the company any relief because none of its property was taken, and the court had no jurisdiction to determine the question of

The facts are, I may say to the Senator from Utah, that by reason of the Government's taking over this warehouse and forcing the Southern Products Co. to remove the cotton, the company paid out $13,000 in actual cash, the repayment of which is recommended by the Committee on Claims. The company suffered $15,000 additional damages for which the committee did not think it was entitled to receive compensation; so in the bill as reported we allowed only the amount which the company actually paid out, as found by the Board of Contract Adjustment.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LOGAN. Yes. Mr. KING. I invite the Senator's attention to a few excerpts from the decision of the Court of Claims. The Senator knows that that is a court which has jurisdiction of matters submitted to it.

Mr. LOGAN. Yes.

Mr. KING. And its decisions we respect, as is evidenced by the numerous judgments which we pay when the court certifies as to its findings.

I find this language in the decision of the court by Judge Hay, a very able man; and it is concurred in by Judges Graham, Downey, Booth, and Campbell, chief justice:

The injuries of which plaintiff complains were mere consequences incidental to the exercise of the governmental power to quences incidental to the exercise of the governmental power to take over the Bush Terminal Co.'s property. It is to be remembered that all property is held, whether stored in one's own premises or in that of someone else, subject to the exercise of the right of eminent domain, and even where real estate is taken in the exercise of eminent domain, necessitating the removal of personal property therefrom, the weight of authority is that the expense of such removal is not an element of the just compensation to be allowed the owner.

In this case the plaintiff had no interest in the property taken.

In this case the plaintiff had no interest in the property taken. The Government did not take the property of the plaintiff, and hence there is no similarity between this case and the case of A. W. Duckett v. The United States (266 U. S. 149). In the Duckett case the court held that the plaintiff was entitled to the value of the unexpired lease. There is no evidence here that there was any unexpired lease, nor any evidence of the value of the space occupied by the plaintiff in the warehouse. The injuries complained of are wholly incidental.

The petition must be dispussed

The petition must be dismissed.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I may say to the Senator that the reason why the claim is here is that the court held it had no jurisdiction on account of the fact that the law did not cover damages incident to the removal of personal property. The Court of Claims could grant the claimant no relief, and because the law did not cover the matter, and the Board to which I have referred could not grant any relief, the claimant has no place to go to get the money which the Government forced him to pay out for removing his cotton. That is the reason why he is here.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I shall not object, but I may move to reconsider.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MACK COPPER CO.

The bill (S. 1878) conferring jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to hear and determine the claims of the Mack Copper Co. was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to have an explanation of that bill.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I think, after having gone over these claims and submitted reports, that any Senator who is really interested ought to make the explanation about any particular bill.

This bill relates to an old, old claim which has been before the court and the different departments of the Government and the Congress of the United States, in one form or another, for many years.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LOGAN. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. I should like to say that any Senator is really fortunate to be absent when he can have the Senator from Kentucky take his place, because his explanations are always so lucid and valuable.

Mr. LOGAN. I thank the Senator. The Government took over six or seven thousand acres of property in San Diego County, Calif., during the war. The method of taking it was afterward declared by the courts to be illegal. It secured a lease of some nature from the owners, and the court held that that lease was invalid.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator a question. Is this the case we had before us where it was claimed that some sticks were stuck in the ground and some rocks removed?

Mr. LOGAN. This is the claim. Mr. KING. Then, I object.

Mr. LOGAN. Before the Senator objects, let me say that the bill does not allow anything. The contention is made and, I think, perhaps soundly—that the court had no jurisdiction to determine certain questions, and there was never presented to the court the question of damages. The Government filled the land full of bombs which had not exploded, they concreted a part of the land for cavalry maneuvers, and things of that kind.

Now-although I do not want to take the time of the Senate—the claimants come here and say, "We have a right to be heard in the Court of Claims of the United States about those matters which were not previously before the court." That is all there is to the claim, and, if they are entitled to anything, I suppose they ought to be heard; if they are not, it will not do any harm to hear them.

Mr. KING. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

ANTON W. FISCHER

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1846) for the relief of the estate of Anton W. Fischer, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment to insert a proviso at the end of the bill, so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to refund, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the estate of Anton W. Fischer, late of Owatonna, Minn., the sum of $275.98, under existing rules and regulations, said amount having been illegally collected from said estate, as stated by letter of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue dated February 7, 1923: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services renagent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwith-standing. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TERESA DE PREVOST

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1360) for the relief of Teresa de Prevost, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with amendments.

The first amendment was on page 1, line 5, to strike out "$100,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$25,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, may we have an explanation of this bill. It seems to call for the appropriation of a very large amount.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, if the Senator from Tennessee will be good enough between now and the next call of the calendar to read the report, I believe that will be much more satisfactory than for me to attempt to explain the bill at this time. It is rather lengthy. It has been pending 15 years. I shall ask that the bill go over, so as to give the Senator from Tennessee opportunity to read it.

Mr. McKELLAR. I shall do so. The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard, and the bill will be passed over.

HARRY P. HOLLIDGE

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 760) for the relief of Harry P. Hollidge, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, to add a proviso at the end of the bill, so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Harry P. Hollidge, the sum of $903.70, in full settlement of all claims against the Government for damages to his automobile as the result of a collision with a Packard truck belonging to the War Department, said collision occurring on the evening of March 27, 1919, on the Baltimore-Washington Pike: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with a state of the services rendered in connection. attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN HENRY TACKETT

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 155) for the relief of John Henry Tackett, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with amendments, on page 1, line 7, after the words "sum of", to strike out "$464" and to insert in lieu thereof "$264"; and on page 2, line 2, to strike out the words "for the purchase of an artificial limb, $200 ", so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Claude D. Jones, Superintendent of the National Training School for Boys, the sum of $264, to be used in the payment of expenses incident to the illness of John Henry Tackett, former inmate of the National Training School for Boys, which resulted in amputation of the leg on March 22, 1932, such sum to be expended as follows: For hospitalization, Sibley Hospital, Washington, D. C., $129; for medical and surgical treatment, Dr. Custis Lee Hall, $135.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading read the third time, and passed.

WINIFRED MEAGHER

The bill (S. 38) for the relief of Winifred Meagher was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. I object.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President. will not the Senator withhold his objection?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah withhold his objection?

Mr. KING. Yes; for a moment.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, the Senator will recall that the Senator from Utah and I discussed this bill last year. It so happens that the claimant in this case is the widow of a doctor who was a long-time friend of mine.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator suffer an interruption?

Mr. COPELAND. Certainly.

Mr. KING. My only objection is that there has been considerable discussion as to the propriety of remitting such claims as this, claims in tort, to the district courts throughout the United States. It has been suggested that we set up a tribunal for the determination of such tort claims. If we establish this precedent, then anybody who is injured in my State or in any other State may go into the district court and bring suit against the Government for tort, oftentimes when the Government may not be fully advised as to the character of the tort, perhaps has had no knowledge of the injury except when the suit was brought within the period of the statute of limitations, and it places the Government at great disadvantage.

It seems to me, as I have suggested upon a number of occasions, that if we are to permit actions for tort to be brought, some tribunal ought to be set up for that purpose.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I think the Senator is entirely right. If the Senator will observe the bill itself, he will see a proviso on line 9 designed to give the very protection for which he contends so strongly and so properly. This is the proviso:

Provided, That such notice of the suit shall be given to the Attorney General of the United States as may be provided by order of the said court: Provided further, That said suit shall be brought and commenced within 6 months of the date of the passage of

Likewise, if the Senator will read the report on page 3, at the middle of the page, he will find that the attorney for the claimant said this:

Dr. Meagher might be considered under the rules laid down in the "American Restatement of the Law of Torts" as invitee. He attended a place that was open to the public and to which the public was invited, and which fact the owner, in this case the United States, knew was open to the public pursuant to the invitation extended.

And so forth.

Mr. President, the camp referred to in the pending measure is owned by the Government. It was used by the National Guard of Pennsylvania and also by the National Guard of Virginia, but the Government itself was in full ownership and control between sessions of the camps, and at some time a concrete pillar, 2 feet square, was broken. Just when it happened, of course, no one can know. Undoubtedly it was replaced upon the base and appeared to be safe.

There was an open invitation to the public to attend the camp at a review on Sunday afternoon, and the doctor, who was a major in the Reserve, and who had served in the Army, went there, and he was the victim of somebody's carelessness. Whether it was the carelessness of the National Guard of Pennsylvania or the carelessness of the War Department would have to be determined. It would seem to me, however, that certainly some relief should be given to this widow. A child was badly injured at the same time the father was killed.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me? Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. KING. I find this statement made in the report:

The sole question in this case appears to be as to whether the The sole question in this case appears to be as to whether the Federal Government or the State of Pennsylvania is responsible for the accident which resulted in the death of Dr. Meagher, and your committee is of the opinion that in fairness to the claimant the matter should be determined by a court, and it is accordingly recommended that jurisdiction be conferred upon the Court of Claims to hear and determine the claim.

Mr. COPELAND. That is correct.

Mr. KING. Notwithstanding the fact that Mr. Hurley, as | Secretary of War, stated that the War Department expressed the opinion that whatever liability, legal or moral, exists in this case is a State and not a Federal matter, if the Senator will amend his bill to refer the case to the Court of Claims, I shall have no objection.

Mr. COPELAND. How would the Senator suggest that that be done?

Mr. KING. Let it be passed over temporarily.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over temporarily.

Mr. COPELAND subsequently said: Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to return to Calendar No. 171. I have conferred with the Senator from Utah [Mr. King], and he has no objection.

Mr. KING. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 38) for the relief of Winifred Meagher, which was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon the United States Court of Claims to hear, determine, and render judgment upon the claim of Winifred Meagher for damages on account of the death of her husband, Dr. John F. W. Meagher, caused by and as a result of injuries sustained while a visitor at the military camp at Tobyhanna, Pa., on August 23, 1931: Provided, That such notice of the suit shall be given to the Attorney General of the United States as may be provided by order of the said court: Provided further, That said suit shall be brought and commenced within 6 months of the date of the passage of this act.

YVONNE HALE

WILLIAM J. COCKE

The bill (S. 941) for the relief of William J. Cocke was announced as next in order.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator from Kentucky tell us about the bill?

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, this is a claim growing out of a contract or agreement for the purchase of garbage at an Army camp. The claimant, Mr. William J. Cocke, filed a claim for about $33,000 in the Court of Claims.

I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Tennessee to the portion of the decision of the Court of Claims in which it is said that this claimant undoubtedly was very badly treated, and that he was damaged. The committee went over the matter very carefully, and took the best information we could obtain from the departments, and reached the conclusion that the claimant was entitled to a little more than $9,000, as provided for in the bill. He was damaged much more than that, and he has no place to go except to come here and get it. I think the decision of the Court of Claims very clearly indicates that he is entitled to some compensation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. KING. I think I shall ask that the bill go over.

THE PRESIDENT'S WREATH ON "N. I. R. A."

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President, though verbally the President asks for a 2-year extension of the "blue code" act, the logic of his funeral eulogy is to hang a wreath and pronounce an elegy over the grave of "N. I. R. A."

When he asks for cessation of monopolistic practices, he, in all logic, asks for the repeal of the 600 codes which legalize monopolistic practices.

When he frankly admits that "unquestioned power must rest in the Government to establish in any event certain minimum standards of fair competition in commercial practices" he calls for the restoration of the antitrust laws administered by the Federal Trade Commission—laws which the N. R. A. suspended.

When he inveighs against the dangers of "industrial and labor chaos", he strikes at the vitals of "N. I. R. A.", whose outstanding achievement is "industrial and labor chaos."

When he calls for "new safeguards for small enterprises", he demands repeal of the entire blue list of 600 prohibitive codes which throttle small enterprises to strengthen the grip of legalized monopoly.

When he demands cessation of "license to strangle fair competition under the apparent sanction of law" he demands repeal of all the blue codes and licenses issued with his signature

When he asks for denial of the right "to indulge in unfair practices or exploitation of labor or consumers" he asks, first, for the restoration of the antitrust laws instituted against such "unfair practices and exploitation", and, second, he asks the end of all the 600 codes which legalize such practices and exploitation.

When he admits "the obvious fact that the way to enforce laws, codes, and regulations relating to industrial practices is not to seek to put people in jail" he naively and at length consistently admits the wisdom of abolishing all the 600 codes which provide for jail sentences as the means of farcical enforcement.

That wise admonition in the President's message, namely: Small enterprises especially should be given added protection against discrimination and oppression", carries with it the unwritten advice which all small enterprises in the United States whole-heartedly applaud: To drop all codes and N. R. A. licenses and the entire "crack-down" system with its millions of blue eagles for oppression of small enterprises.

When he speaks with disapprobation of "gouging in retail sales and prices" he again hits at the vitals of N. I. R. A., as when the immediate effect of the cotton textile code, the first N. I. R. A. code, boosted the retail price of denims, prints, and overalls 100 percent in the first 100 days of enforcement—as witness the market quotations of such an excellent newspaper authority as the New York Times during the last 6 months of 1933 following the signing of the cotton textile Doubtless every Member of Congress will agree with the President in this statement:

The fundamental principles of the antitrust laws should be more adequately applied.

Indeed, the distinguished Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], by a bill introduced at the last session and still pending, has shown the President how to apply the "fundamental principles of the antitrust laws", namely, to repeal the N. R. A. provision suspending the operation of the antitrust laws, and the most effective way to accomplish that result in this session is to allow N. I. R. A. to expire on June 16, 1935, pursuant to law.

The late administrator of the N. R. A., the man who sat over the nest where the blue eagles hatched and then distributed them over the land to the bedlam of brass-band parades—the late Brigadier General Johnson, assistant to Bernie Baruch—has borne adequate testimony that when the antitrust laws are restored the blue codes are dead, and N. I. R. A. calls for burial. Therefore, when the President agrees with the Senate and the country at large that the fundamental principles of the antitrust laws should be applied, he hangs a wreath over the grave of N. I. R. A. and reads an elegy.

On all funeral occasions it is in order for the pastor in charge to forget the sins of the late departed and chant all praises one dares to venture to cheer the bereaved.

Thus, the President ventures to bring out that old tale, as the casket is being lowered, about N. I. R. A. having given employment to that old 4,000,000. Meantime, the leaders of the American Federation of Labor, who seem to be absent from the mourner's bench, politely refrain from presenting the only authentic data of unemployment available, namely, that N. I. R. A. has increased unemployment by over 1,000,-000 in the past year.

The President is strangely silent, with regard to the details of collective bargaining. He briefly speaks of assurances of collective bargaining between employers and employes.

But he well knows, from the broadsides of labor denunciation of the N. R. A. administration and its code authorities, that the entire body of organized labor in the United States are well agreed, that the N. R. A. has brought more uncertainty, more strikes and labor riots, more war between employers and employed, and less collective bargaining, than this country has had for years.

The first N. R. A. code, the Cotton Textile Code, started the most widespread industrial strike in the country's history—and that code war started right at the office desks of the N. R. A. administration. The leader of the employers in that strike, Mr. Sloan, was Chairman of the N. R. A. Cotton Textile Code Authority.

It is evident from both the testimony of President Green, of the A. F. of L., and the speeches of President John L. Lewis, of the Miners Union, as well as from the history of the unprecedented strike movement following the imposition of the respective industrial codes—that there will be no assurance of the restoration of collective bargaining until the last requiem has been sung over the grave of N. I. R. A.

The President also brings up that innocuous tale of N. I. R. A. as the mother of the cause to abolish child labor. Of course, the President knows full well that, years before N. I. R. A. was hatched by his "brain trust", a majority of the States had child-labor laws in effective administration under State labor bureaus. The "brain trust" simply hopped onto a popular band wagon. Among the few States which did not have such child-labor regulation were those which never voted anything but a Democratic ticket—or else, some like his own State where, under a Tammany political regime, the sweatshop was allowed to exist in spite of the law.

His reference to the dangers of disastrous overproduction has no application to any industrial condition existing since his election to the White House. Underproduction was the rule when he was inaugurated, and underproduction has been the underlying and promoting cause of unemployment to an increasing extent, and a disastrous extent, ever since he signed the 600 codes further restricting production and thereby further restricting the field of employment.

And while the alphabetical units are under fire, it would be well if the A. A. A. broth were poured down the sewer. Its only result has been famine, misery, lost farms, lost livelihood, lost hope for the farmers while their markets have been taken by foreign countries. Rising prices now do them no good and only add to the consumers' burden. The dust storms of the West already appearing giving warning of another severe drought the coming season. God takes a hand to show his wrath at the breaking of his laws of thrift, by killing cattle, hogs, pigs, chickens, and shipping in foreign meat to take their place—by destruction of cotton, sugar beets, wheat, corn, and fruit while importing these products and their derivatives.

That is the crying economic evil of the times—restriction of the free operation of the industries which employ labor and furnish markets for the farmer. And the first step to end it is to hasten the burial of N. I. R. A. and her blue-eagle progeny.

We can then join the President in writing elegies, and laying wreaths on the grave of that now "unknown soldier", General Johnson. We need not as yet celebrate the funeral of Richberg, for we know, on the testimony of Johnson, that the mourners are attending to Richberg in unique ways of their own, as when Johnson says:

Richberg has ants in his pants.

The closing note of the President's funeral oration on N. I. R. A. reads thus:

You will lighten the burdens of unemployment and economic mecurity.

Coupled with the testimony of the American Federation of Labor, that the N. R. A. has increased unemployment, and the universal verdict of industrial authorities, that the "crack down" system has produced economic insecurity, our duty appears to be clear, namely, to permit N. I. R. A. to expire, as provided by law, on June 16, 1935. If such is done, the country will heave a huge sigh of relief.

STATE, JUSTICE, COMMERCE, AND LABOR DEPARTMENTS APPROPRIATIONS

WORK-RELIEF PROGRAM

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, on Thursday last the Senate cast a vote upon the so-called "McCarran amendment" to the joint resolution carrying the $4,880,000,000 appropriation. The amendment was adopted by a majority of a single vote. On the next day the distinguished majority leader, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. Robinson]. moved that the joint resolution be recommitted to the Committee on Appropriations. It was assumed by most of us, if not all, on this side of the Chamber that the joint resolution was recommitted largely for the purpose of separating that which was to be appropriated for relief, namely, $880,-000,000, from the remainder of the joint resolution carrying what was known as the "Public Works appropriation of $4,000,000,000." I think every Senator on both sides of the Chamber assumed that the Senate was ready at once to make such a relief appropriation.

On the next day, Friday, there appeared an editorial en the front page of the Washington Herald which the distinguished leader of the majority this morning undertook to have placed in the RECORD. It is entitled "Support the President." Some objection was made to it, and I should not refer to it except for the fact that an effort was made by the distinguished Senator to place it in the RECORD.

The editorial goes on to regret that on President Roosevelt's "wise recommendation for security wage on public works" the Senate has "surrendered to the demagogues." It is a little surprising to me that any Senator should urge that the editorial be placed in the RECORD by unanimous consent.

Further along in the editorial it was said:

It was regrettable to find Senator Wagner, of New York, as MCCARRAN's chief aide on the floor of the upper House.

Evidently these two men and the 42 others who followed them heard the American Federation of Labor crack the whip. By a margin of one, the majority of the Senators voting responded to the dictation of the union lobby without stopping to consider the merits of the question.

Further along, the editorial said:

Likewise, if at the behest of an unreasonable lobby the considered advice of the President is to be rejected, then the time has indeed come for an aroused electorate to protest vigorously against lack of integrity and absence of sober judgment in the Senate.

Further along in the editorial it was said:

The basic amendment converts the President's program from an economically sound program to a dangerously unsound one.

The last two paragraphs read:

Mr. Roosevelt should stick by his guns and exert his leadership in the House and in conference.

Meantime, every thinking American should make known to his representatives in the Senate and House his insistence that Congress support the President on this vital issue.

Mr. President, in the next issue of the Washington Herald, on Sunday morning, we find an article headed "Robinson's Plea for Works Bill Urges Patriotism Be Placed Above Politics." In that article the Senator from Arkansas said:

Do those who have upset this program for the present realize the full effect of their actions? Do they understand that to guarantee the prevailing wage means the perpetuation of the dole and the problems of unemployment rather than their solution in a sane and practicable way?

VOTE IS CITED

The vote in the Senate which incorporated the McCarran amendment by a majority of 1 was contributed by 21 Democrats and 21 Republicans, 1 Progressive, and 1 Farmer-Laborite. The amend-ment thus approved would increase the cost of discontinuing the ment thus approved would increase the cost of discontinuing the dole and substituting work relief by approximately $2,340,000,000.

The exact amount, of course, cannot be stated; but the weight of evidence taken by the Senate Committee on Appropriations is that, instead of $4,880,000,000, $7,220,000,000 will be required to accomplish the two purposes, namely, the discontinuance of the dole and the temporary absorption of the unemployed in works of permanent value and importance.

The Senator from Arkansas further said in the article:

It is possible, of course, to report and pass on appropriations for $880,000,000, thus providing funds required in the immediate picture for relief purposes and postponing a conclusion respecting unemployment relief.

Those in the Senate who have been denouncing extravagance will find themselves wholly unable to justify the increase of the expense of the work-relief program by more than $2,000,000,000.

Those who champion the prevailing wage may discover their error when it is too late to prevent the augmentation of the rolls of the unemployed and possibly the diminution of the compensation of workers who are engaged in industry because of depreciated

Then comes a paragraph which furnishes the proper heading for the article:

The time has arrived when patriotism should be placed above politics, both partisan and personal.

This was on the very next day after the distinguished Senator from Arkansas had undertaken to defend the announcement of the Speaker of the House of Representatives that 10,000 jobs would be found for deserving Democrats on the C. C. C. pay roll, $130,000,000 of which was to come out of the $880,000,000 provided in the joint resolution. It brought forth a compliment and criticism of me by the distinguished Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS]. He complimented me in the first instance by saying he had given me credit for having good sense; and after I had made a little speech in the Senate calling attention to this fact, he concluded that I did not have much sense after all. [Laughter.]

I am not complaining about the distinguished Senator from Virginia. I have a very high regard for his intelligence. and I thought he might have some for mine; but I realize that it is different when one disagrees with him. Then the Senator from Virginia has an entirely different notion about a man's intelligence.

I call attention, Mr. President, to this editorial which I first read and to the statement from the distinguished Senator from Arkansas [Mr. Robinson] for the purpose of showing, as the newspapers report, that there is beginning now an effort in the form of propaganda all over the country to compel the Senate to get in line with the demands made by the President of the United States; and I make these few remarks at this moment only for the purpose of preventing the people of the country from being deceived.

In the President's annual address he pleaded for a publicworks program for the sole purpose of putting three and one-half million people to work. It is impossible to read that message and find that the President had any other thing in view. In other words, it was not for the purpose of priming the pumps of private industry. It was for the purpose of furnishing jobs to men now on the Federal relief rolls.

It has already been pointed out that in order to do this it is not necessary to increase the appropriation at all. other words, we can maintain the wage as provided in the McCarran amendment and give just as much relief to the men now on the relief roll as we could under the President's program. Not a single dollar need be added, and not a single dollar need be taken away.

The question then arises as to what advantage there is in the policy recommended by the President and what is the serious objection to the McCarran amendment. The difference is this: At the end of the program the same amount would have been paid out for wages under either plan. The same relief would have been given to men on the relief rolls in both instances. There would not, however, have been created as much-using the President's own words in his annual address-" future new wealth for the Nation."

That brings us back to the real purpose of the publicworks program. I have shown that the objective mentioned by the President can be carried out under either of the plans with exactly the same amount of money. If, however, we are to assume that the President intended to increase the future new wealth of the Nation by compelling labor to work for whatever wages he might decide, then, of course, this amendment does wreck the President's program.

I doubt, however, whether the public generally is willing that the great Federal Government shall compel people now out of employment to work for a small wage in order that the Government may profit by their distress. Indeed, I doubt whether there would be as much advantage as the President and the distinguished Senator from Arkansas seem to believe. If we wanted, for instance, to take a man off the relief roll and pay him $12 per week, which is approximately $50 per month, and he is a man who has been accustomed to receiving $6 per day, we would employ him but 2 days under the prevailing wage, and we would employ him 3 days under the President's program. Under the President's program he would receive but $4 per day; but I doubt very much whether the average person, feeling-as would be perfectly natural—that his great Government was taking advantage of his condition and paying him $4 per day while his fellow employee, working upon a private job, was receiving $6 per day, would accomplish very much more in the 3 days than he would in the 2.

There is another thing that seems to me to be entirely inconsistent in the President's program. He recommends a huge appropriation for public works, and he says that the public works must be useful, not just for a day or a year, but the kind of improvement that will increase the wealth of the Nation. He states that these public works would not necessarily be done now except for the purpose of taking care of the unemployed.

I should like, however, to call attention to the conditions existing in an industry that finds it necessary to improve or enlarge its plant. In what condition does such an industry find itself? The great Federal Government has fixed the minimum wage which it shall pay for that permanent job. The industry dare not go to the relief rolls and offer to pay more than a person is receiving in the form of relief, but less than the wage fixed by the N. R. A. That industry is compelled, by codes approved by the President, to pay a wage that greatly increases the cost of such permanent improvement. How inconsistent does it become, therefore, for the Federal Government, merely because it has the power, to say that Federal projects increasing the wealth of the Nation shall be done on a wage scale that is out of all proportion to that which industry is compelled to pay?

I have always doubted whether the President's program was a practical one; and I have always been convinced that shortly after beginning work under this program he would reach the conclusion that it was not practical, and would modify it accordingly. I have in mind, for instance, a situation like this: A particular craft is highly organized. A condition of membership is that the members shall not work for less than the wage agreed upon between that craft and the employer. Some of these members find themselves out of work and on the relief roll. The President finds that on a particular job he is compelled to have the members of this craft in order to carry out the project. What happens to that poor, distressed man who is out of a job? If he breaks with his organization, he probably can never again get a job in private employment. What will the President do under circumstances like that? There is but one practical thing that he can do, and that is to pay that man the pre-

Mr. President, I wanted to make those observations in order, first, to make clear my own position with respect to the matter, and to make certain, so far as I am able, that the public shall not be deceived by what has happened here.

In order that this propaganda may be carried further, we find in the same newspaper-the Washington Herald of Monday, February 25-this headline:

Thousands of protests against wrecking of works bill hit Capitol. Wide public support of President is evidenced.

And then this editorial, entitled:

Reckless Demagogy.

I had some notion of what "demagogy" meant, and what a demagogue is-but in order that there may not be any doubt about it I have refreshed my recollection and I quote from Webster this definition of a demagogue:

One who plays an insincere role in public life for the sake of gaining political influence or office; a poser in politics; especially, one who panders to popular prejudice or seeks to inflame reasonless passions in the advancement of his personal interests.

I think the editor of this newspaper might read that definition with some benefit to himself and to his paper.

The editorial begins:

The gross stupidity and crass demagogy of the McCarran amendment to the Relief Appropriation Act has caused a Nation-wide storm of indignation.

The storm is rising every minute and bodes ill for the self-serving Senators who cast their votes in favor of paying men on relief a wage sufficiently excessive to keep them out of private

Nothing but discreditably selfish political motives caused these Senators to vote in favor of an organized minority and against reason, against duty, against their country, and against their President.

And in a moment, Mr. President, I shall refer to what this newspaper has said in the past with respect to supporting the President-

The 21 Republican Senators who thought to put the President in a hole, however right he might be, and however destructive their action might prove to the country's welfare, will not find their party or their own personal interests benefited by such discreditable policies.

This busy brow-beating lobby of the American Federation of Labor is serving badly the cause it professes to represent.

Mr. President, I have always been annoyed when somebody accused me of casting a vote because I was being controlled by the American Federation of Labor. I have always been annoyed when somebody accused me of casting a vote because of Father Coughlin's radio addresses; but I am not certain that I would not rather be accused of either or both of those things than to be accused of following the Washington Herald

The hybrid majority in the Senate, temporarily created by the common possession on the part of its Members of utterly unworthy motives, must quickly reverse its position and join the country in the latter's unanimous support of the President on

Now, Mr. President, I call attention particularly to the persons to whom this editorial is addressed.

This editorial is addressed to the hybrid and harlequin majority in the Senate.

It is addressed to you, Senators McCarran, Wagner, and Long, chronic demagogs.

chronic demagogs.

It is addressed to you, Senators Adams, Black, Bone, Bulkley, Costigan, Donahey, Lonergan, Maloney, McGill, Murray, Neeley, O'Mahoney, Reynolds, Schwellenbach, Truman, Van Nuys, Walsh, and Wheeler, renegade Democrats.

And to you, Senators Austin, Barbour, Borah, Capper, Carey, Couzens, Cutting, Davis, Dickinson, Frazier, Gibson, Hastings, Johnson, McNary, Norris, Nye, Schall, Steiwer, Townsend, JOHNSON, McNary, Norris, Nye, Schall, Steiwer, Townsend, Vandenberg, and White, short-sighted and ill-advised Republicans.

And the last paragraph, Mr. President:

The intelligent and loyal citizens of the whole country should communicate with their Senators and demand that they consider the welfare of the Nation and support the President.

Mr. President, let me see whether that is exactly in line with some other things this newspaper has said.

I read from an editorial appearing in the same newspaper on January 31, 1935, headed "A National Disgrace." Let us see who was going to disgrace the Nation this time.

A NATIONAL DISGRACE

Article 1, section 1, of the Constitution of the United States says: "All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and a House of Representatives."

There is nothing here about Congress being a mere rubber stamp for Executive mandates, such as was the case with the Seventythird Congress

There is nothing here about Congress being a corps of secretaries and errand boys to Cabinet officers.

The section above quoted says specifically all legislative powers. These powers cannot be delegated to any other branch of the Government.

That the founders of the Republic intended Congress to be all-paramount in legislative matters is evidenced by their provision in the Constitution for overriding an Executive veto by a two-thirds vote.

The men who fashioned the Constitution feared the usurpation of executive authority.

The Seventy-third Congress grovelled in spineless obsequious-ness before the ukases of the executive branch of the Government.

That Congress came dangerously near to the automatic yes-yes legislative bodies of the one-man governments in Europe

The Supreme Court's decision in the N. R. A. oil code was a powerful whack on the soles of the feet of a sleeping watchman by the guardian of our liberties.

Is our Constitution only a scrap of paper and the Congress of the United States only an executive switchboard with 531 plugs?

Mr. President, that was on January 31, a little less than a month ago. In that connection I may say that those of us on this side have not opposed the public-works program recommended by the President. We have opposed a joint resolution of a few lines which sought to give him complete authority to decide what work he will have done and what wages he will pay. That is what we have complained about.

On more than one occasion we have insisted that if the President has a public-works program, and has anything to recommend such as Secretary Ickes says they have in their desks, projects amounting to more than $8,000,000,000, to recommend to Congress, and will send a list here, he will find very much less trouble with his bill, because what we want to do is our constitutional duty.

We want to pass upon the appropriation for these projects which the President has selected; but we want to find out what the projects are, and when we find out what they are we want to determine for ourselves whether they are a practical sort of projects, upon which the President can cut the wages or cannot.

All of us agree with the general principle that when he has men on the pay roll raking leaves and picking up paper in the parks, that is the kind of a job where he might very well reduce the wages below those paid in the neighborhood. That might very well be done without disturbing labor at all. There was a made job, with no effort made to increase the assets of the Nation. But when the President of the United States says to the Congress that he wants $4,000,000,-000 in order to put three and a half million people to work, and that is his sole object, and says he will endeavor to do it by methods which will result in increasing the wealth of the Nation, I am reminded of what has been said about making profit out of the misery around us. That has been charged against great industrialists time and time again; but if it be true of them, how much more despicable is it to have it done by the Federal Government itself!

Mr. President, I have followed the President, and voted to give him some powers he requested. I voted for the Economy Act as requested in the President's message of March 10, 1933. I realized that that act gave the President unusual authority so far as the veterans were concerned. It was urged upon us, however, that from a practical point of view it was probably the only way in which we could correct the abuses that had grown up from time to time in the matter of veterans' compensation. The country was on the road to bankruptcy; and I, like many other people, was frightened. I sacrificed a principle in order that we might save the Nation: but is it not rather strange that the President should begin his campaign of seeking additional power in the name of economy and then suddenly change it to one of extraordinary expenditures and extraordinary amounts?

There is a vast difference between the two. There is but one danger in giving extraordinary powers to the President to economize, and that is that some person may thus be injured by failure of the Government to pay as much as it ought to pay. The danger of injury in such cases is only to individuals, and if a mistake be made it is to be made in favor of the Government.

The turning over to the President of large sums of money to be expended as he may deem wise is exactly the reverse of this. The danger, as such, is not to the individual. The Government is the only organization that can lose by an unwise expenditure. That means, of course, a loss to the people as a whole.

There is another distinction between the two. The discretion to economize, while it necessarily carries with it power, is not the kind of power that is likely to be improperly used. On the other hand, the power to spend money is entirely different and necessarily carries with it the power to dictate. Money has the same power in the hands of the President, who is under no restrictions as to how it shall be expended, as it has in the hands of any person, or group of persons. Money may be offered by the Government as an inducement to those who are in need of it to give something in return just as in any private transaction.

Around the taxing power, and the power to spend money, people in civilized countries have fought for centuries. Kings have lost their heads because they were not willing to give up such powers. Bloody revolutions have been fought in order to secure and maintain these powers for the people.

I speak here only of the principle involved, and do not intend in any way to reflect upon the honesty or good intentions of the present Executive. But, I respectfully submit that we must stick to the American principle of controlling this Nation by laws, definite in their character, rather than give up that control to discretion of men. This principle should apply with more exactness to appropriations than to anything else.

Mr. President, I have only made these few observations for the purpose of showing that, so far as I am concerned, I do not propose that this propaganda shall have any effect upon me. I do not propose that this newspaper, which calls me a demagogue, shall have any influence with me. I propose to use my own judgment.

I stand ready at any time to vote whatever is necessary for relief. More than that, if the President says that the best way to take care of three and a half million people is by a public-works program, and if he be satisfied, and will make the recommendation to Congress that we spend the $4,000,-000,000 for that purpose, and will send to the Congress a list of the projects he has in mind for that purpose, in order to carry out his program, I will assist him; but, so long as I sit in the Senate I do not propose to vote to turn over to the present President, or to any other President, any such sum of money as $4,000,000,000 without any restriction upon it.

I am not half so much interested in the restriction placed on the President by the McCarran amendment as I am that we should give him this authority without any restriction as to where he shall spend the money or what he shall do with it.

I can conceive of the administration being able to work up a great sentiment in the country by promising to place in this State or that one, some great job that will relieve the unemployed; I can understand that. But I am not depending upon promises of any kind, so far as I am concerned. If any Member of the Congress has a public-works project which he thinks the Congress would approve, let him bring it forth and let us pass upon it. There is no particular hurry at the moment about passing the works bill carrying the whole $4,000,000,000. We are going to be here a long time the coming summer, as I see it, and we will have all kinds of opportunities to pass upon these questions. Let the President send his recommendation to the Congress if he wants it approved. That is my position, and I do not want any mistake made about it.

Mr. HASTINGS subsequently said: Mr. President, I overlooked a little while ago an additional editorial which I intended to call to the attention of the Senate, appearing in the Washington Herald of January 30, 1935, with the pictures of 38 United States Senators, who, as this paper states, "constitute a new patriotic roll of honor."

The heading is:

These men saved the Nation. They deserve your gratitude.

The article continues:

The 36 Senators who voted against the ratification of the League

The 36 Senators who voted against the ratification of the League Court protocols prevented ratification. They kept faith with the people by carrying out their mandate.

These Senators have won for the American people another battle in the long, long fight to keep America American.

They have shown themselves to be what Daniel Webster said the Members of the Senate should always be—men of "absolute independence", who "know no masters", and "acknowledge no

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?
Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.
Mr. ROBINSON. Do I understand that the Senator from Delaware is citing that editorial as another illustration of the perfidy of the Hearst press?

Mr. HASTINGS. I shall make myself perfectly clear. Mr. ROBINSON. But the Senator is not making himself

Mr. HASTINGS. If the Senator will just be patient, I shall do so.

Mr. ROBINSON. But I cannot be patient. [Laughter.] Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, I continue:

By keeping faith with the American people in the settlement of this issue the 36 Senators who prevented the ratification of the League Court protocols have kept the faith of the Father of his Country.

Thanks to the 36 Senators who voted against the Court and the 2 who were paired against it on the following roll of honor the wish of the Father of his Country has been fulfilled and the Senwho have won this victory are entitled to the lasting gratitude of the American people.

This editorial was published on January 30, and I have already read to the Senate what the same newspaper said about the "renegade Democrats" and the "misguided Republicans."

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. I see that the Senator's picture is published in connection with that article. Does he intend to put that in the RECORD? [Laughter.]

Mr. HASTINGS. Oh, no; I am only reading. I am not offering this newspaper for the RECORD; but I do want to call attention to the names of those who were so eulogized in this editorial under date of January 30, and who have been so severely condemned in the editorial of today, less than a month afterward. They are the following:

Senators Bone, Borah, Carey, Davis, Dickinson, Donahey, Frazier, Hastings, Johnson, Long, McCarran, McGill, Mur-RAY, NORRIS, NYE, REYNOLDS, SCHALL, SCHWELLENBACH, TOWN-SEND, WALSH, WHEELER, and WHITE.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Delaware yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator does not mean to assert, I hope, that because the Hearst newspapers are wrong once they must necessarily be wrong all the time. There is an old saying out in my section of the country that "a blind sow can get an acorn now and then."

Mr. HASTINGS. I leave the Senator from Missouri to decide when they are right and when they are wrong. I do not make any pretense of making that decision until I read what has been said.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I had not been informed that this storm of wrath was expected to break in all its fury, and have had no opportunity of considering in advance the propositions asserted by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. Hastings]. There is one thought that is outstanding in his remarks-that whenever the Hearst newspapers see fit to condemn the administration and its policies they are performing a commendable service, but when they see fit to support the President's policy they are to be condemned.

Of course, I do not endorse the employment of unparliamentary language or of language that reflects on my colleagues and associates in the Senate; but when the Senator from Delaware asserts in one breath that he is in favor of a proper Public Works program, and in the next breath that he is opposed to the only one which has been advanced, the Senate and the country would like to have a more definite explanation than he has been able to supply in his remarks today.

There is a principle which ought not to be forgotten in the heat of debate in the Senate, a principle involved in this proposed legislation; and it is not, as I see it, a partisan question. It ought not to be made a partisan question. The principle that underlies the President's program is one which I think the Senator from Delaware does not fully understand. If he does understand it, he does not correctly analyze it. The fundamental principle in the Public Works program is that labor shall be substituted for relief.

At the present time between three and four million citizens of our country are on the relief rolls. Some of them perform a small amount of labor. Some of them for physical reasons have never been efficient in the performance of work of any kind. A number of them-a considerable number of themare perhaps not qualified to compete with those engaged in private industry. This fact has been recognized from the beginning in our laws and administrative policies relating to Federal relief.

We have proceeded and are proceeding on the theory that, local resources having been exhausted and local agencies having for the most part broken down, there exists a responsibility on the National Government which has not, prior to the present depression, been recognized—a responsibility of making some provision for the millions who, without assistance, would suffer great want.

We have set up a number of agencies from time to time that have performed functions of value and importance in assisting to tide the country and our citizens over the very distressing period which began a few years ago, and which has not yet terminated.

We did not insist, when we created the Civil Works Administration, which employed 4,000,000 men; we did not demand, when we created the Civilian Conservation Corps, which gave work to a large number of young men; we did not insist, when we established the relief system, that those employed should be paid in accordance with prevailing wage standards in the communities affected.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MURRAY in the chair). Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield.

Mr. STEIWER. Is not the Senator overlooking the fact that the moneys used by the Civil Works Administration were moneys which had been appropriated for the Public Works Administration, and that when the money was delivered to the Civil Works Administration it was under the same restraint which had been provided in the Public Works statute, and that the Civil Works Administration, complying with the requirements of that statute, did pay the prevailing wage?

Mr. ROBINSON. No, Mr. President; I cannot agree that the Civil Works Administration paid what is properly termed the prevailing wage. I know that in some instances it was paid. I know that in some localities it was paid; but I know also that prior to the proposal of the President to establish a public-works system under House Joint Resolution 117, or some similar arrangement, there had never been made the demand that union wages be paid to those who were being employed; and I know that while millions are now on the relief rolls, and many of those on the relief rolls are engaged in labor, are employed by the Government, they are not receiving the prevailing wage in the true sense. I know that there have been strikes in some communities on the part of relief workers because of the alleged inadequate compensation that was given them.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield.

Mr. McCARRAN. I take it that the learned Senator from Arkansas realizes that the statute now on the books, and which has been known for many years as the Davis Act, is still in existence, and that all public works performed on public buildings must be conducted with consideration to the prevailing wage.

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes; with relation to public buildings I understand that to be true.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. ADAMS. I think possibly there is an error in the Senator's statement, which I am sure he would be glad to have corrected.

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly.

Mr. ADAMS. In the testimony of Mr. Hopkins before the Committee on Appropriations, which appears on page 94 of the hearings, he stated:

We now pay the prevailing hourly rate of wages.

It is upon that statement that the actions of some of us have been based, as Mr. Hopkins definitely stated that in all the work which was being done under his administration the prevailing wage was being paid, that the hours were short, and that the plan they were pursuing was that they made an allotment of twenty or twenty-five dollars a month, and then the worker worked out that amount at the prevailing scale of wages.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the Senator insists that | $25 a month can be so manipulated as to constitute a prevailing wage when it was disclosed in the debate here that $50 a month would be inadequate for that purpose. I am not speaking of any technical arrangement whereby a man may work one day in the week, and for the limited time in which he works have a large wage, but have no opportunity of earning more than is provided for in that limited time. I am speaking of the practical effect of the arrangement. There is not anyone who knows about the administration of relief who does not realize that the wage paid under the relief system that exists in this country has been a very small one. The heads of families have received very limited amounts. It may be true that for 1 hour or for 6 hours or for 1 day they receive a liberal compensation, but it is also true that they are not given employment for such a length of time as will make their remuneration for a definite period comparable to the prevailing wage.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? Mr. ROBINSON. I yield.

Mr. McCARRAN. I trust that the learned Senator from Arkansas, in his discussion, will distinguish between direct relief under Mr. Hopkins' administration and the Federal projects conducted and carried on under F. E. R. A. In the latter, as disclosed and brought to the Senator's attention by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. Adams], the prevailing wage has always been maintained even by Mr. Hopkins. In the former—that is, direct relief, which is a dole proposition—of course, there could be no prevailing wage.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I do not wish to get into any technical discussion of this subject. One of the primary objects of this proposed legislation is to escape from direct relief; it is to substitute labor security wages for charity or for what may be regarded as in the nature of charity. If we are to accomplish that, if we are to take over into the employment of the Federal Government all who are now on the relief rolls and to pay them the prevailing wage in industry, in my judgment, it will be a practical impossibility ever to end the dole—ever to succeed in getting the unemployed back into private employment.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes; I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WHEELER. I wish to say to the Senator that I think either he misunderstands the purpose of the McCarran amendment or I do. I gather from the Senator's statement that he feels that the McCarran amendment would require the Government to employ these people at a monthly wage equal to the monthly wage that would be paid by private employment. That is not my understanding at all. My understanding is that the Government, if it only wanted to pay $50 a month to some family, would only pay that much, but the Government would not be able to break down the wage scale in the particular community. That is the only thing which is embraced in the amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON. That comes right back to the thought I was discussing a moment ago. If the prevailing wage should be $4 a day or $6, as has been suggested by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. Hastings], would the McCarran amendment permit the Government to employ a laborer for one day per month at $6 a day and to deny him employment for the remainder of the month? If it would, that of itself is sufficient to condemn the proposition.

Mr. WHEELER. I do not think there is a question of a doubt, let me say to the Senator, that under the amendment of the Senator from Nevada if the Government desired to pay the prevailing wage, and we will say the prevailing wage was $4 a day, and at the same time wanted to pay only $50 a month, and felt that amount should be paid, then it would employ a man but 12½ days during that month's time. But what I am afraid of and what I think everyone else who has given consideration to the matter from the standpoint of the disinclination to break down the prevailing wage is afraid of is that if we permitted the Government to pay $50 a month for a month's work it would break down the wage scale which the labor organizations have built up throughout the United States of America.

Not only that, Mr. President, but it seems to me that the Government, for its own benefit and for its own safety, would be the last in the world to want to break down the prevailing wage scale throughout the United States. I think it would be one of the greatest disasters that ever happened to this country if that should take place.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, in answer to what the Senator from Montana has said, I desire to respond that there is no intention on the part of the President, or on the part of anyone who supports his program with regard to work relief, of breaking down the wage scale in the country. The policy of the administration, as I understand, has been to build up and maintain the wage scale. I think those who have sponsored the amendment which is known as the "Mc-Carran amendment" have had an unfounded fear that the effect of giving employment at lower compensation to those who now have no employment at all would be to break down the wage scale. I do not believe such a result would ensue, and the reasons I do not so believe are based on the fact that with 12,000,000 or 10,000,000 persons out of work, having no employment at all, we have been able to maintain the wage scale in private industry.

There is a sound reason, in my judgment, for the distinction which the President makes and which the joint resolution sought to make between the prevailing wage and the wage to be paid in Federal work relief. The object, after all, is to get rid not only of destitution relief but of all forms of work relief, to take the Government, as soon as practicable, out of the business of giving employment to the citizens of the country who have not employment in private industry. The only way that can be done, the only way we can hope to do it, is to make private employment more attractive than Federal employment, and you are proposing and insisting upon the reverse. You are insisting upon making Federal employment equally attractive as private employment and in some respects more attractive than private employment. If that principle prevails, you have not a hope, not a chance of consummating the purpose which prompted this plan and which suggested the proposed legislation. So long as you keep on inviting laborers into the Federal employment system by making it attractive for them to quit private industry and get on the Government pay roll you need not talk to me about ending either the dole or Federal work relief.

The distinction carried in the original joint resolution is a clear and practical one. It is to take from the charity rolls the citizens who are deserving of an opportunity to earn their livelihood and give them a wage upon which they can live but not make it so large that they will refuse employment with private employers when that employment is offered them. The design is to give them a wage that will not make it certain that they will look continuously to the Federal Treasury rather than to the business activities of private industry for their engagement.

This distinction is regarded by myself as fundamental. Senators have talked about giving the President a very large fund and Congress not allotting that fund. In my judgment, it is right and proper that the proposed legislation should be made as specific as is practicable in defining the character of the projects which shall be carried on under Federal work relief and the purposes to which the fund shall be devoted.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President-

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Alabama. Mr. BANKHEAD. Has the Senator heard of any Member of the Senate who, either by speech or by amendments offered to the measure, is insisting upon allotments being made or proposing specific allotments? Has he heard anyone willing to undertake the responsibility of making specific allotments?

Mr. ROBINSON. No, Mr. President-

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President-

Mr. ROBINSON. I will yield in just a moment. Give me an opportunity to answer the Senator from Alabama. I do know that from the beginning there has been a criticism of the plan, based on the fact that it does not specify what shall be done with the funds appropriated and leaves the allotment of the funds to the President; but if we undertook on this floor to say what should be done with the money, we would have such an old-fashioned log-rolling campaign as we have never witnessed in all our experience as legislators; there would probably be demands for about two or three times the amount of money that is to be appropriated, and we would have, lining up for the measure, those who got their projects incorporated and, against it, those who failed to get them incorporated. I now yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. McCARRAN. I only sought to assist the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator is very kind. The Lord knows I need assistance. [Laughter.]

Mr. McCARRAN. I know it, too, and the Senator is going to need more from now on.

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes; probably so; and I should be pleased and surprised if I had the assistance of the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. McCARRAN. The Senator will have the assistance of the Senator from Nevada every time we can do something to build up the country and not tear it down.

Mr. ROBINSON. That is a remarkable statement.

Mr. McCARRAN. The Senator interrupted me, and, of course, I could not answer him. I want to assist the Senator to the extent of answering the learned Senator from Alabama [Mr. Bankhead], who questioned the Senator from Arkansas as to whether or not any Senator had sought to allocate the funds. The Senator from Alabama knows, because he is a member of the Appropriations Committee, that there were attempts repeatedly made to allocate the money.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Who made the attempt, and what was he proposing to allocate, and in what amount?

Mr. McCARRAN. I respectfully draw the attention of the Senator from Alabama to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN], who comes more promptly to my mind.

Mr. BANKHEAD. He certainly made no such offer in the committee when I was there.

Mr. McCARRAN. May I be a little more specific in that the Senator from Arizona sought specifically to allocate a part of this money for highway construction, and that was done—

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I shall resume the floor now myself.

Mr. BANKHEAD. He did not offer it in the committee. The Senator is absolutely wrong.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, my information is that there was no offer in the committee to allocate the funds carried in the bill. There was and is a general discussion with reference to that subject.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President-

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to suggest to the Senator that it is hardly fair, in my judgment, to classify everyone who voted for the McCarran amendment with those who believe that Congress ought to specify the different projects for which the money shall be used. I have no doubt many of us who supported the McCarran amendment do not subscribe to the doctrine that the various projects ought to be submitted to Congress in each case for action and approval or disapproval. I have never advocated any such suggestion as that.

Mr. ROBINSON. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. Did the Senator understand that my argument implied any such conclusion?

Mr. NORRIS. One might place that construction upon it. I think the Senator was right in a statement he made a moment ago, because I have said the same thing myself in about how the money substance, though not quite as frankly as the Senator made so indefinite as it is?

it, that if we should pursue that course we would in the end have a pork-barrel log-rolling scheme the like of which has never been equaled in the history of the United States.

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes; and we probably would not have as good a result so far as the public is concerned as we would obtain by the arrangement contemplated in the joint resolution.

Mr. NORRIS. That may be.

Mr. ROBINSON. I did not intend to imply and I do not think my language warranted the construction that all those who favored the McCarran amendment also favored an amendment definitely allocating all the funds carried in the joint resolution. I did say and I repeat that I think it is good legislation to specify the purposes of appropriation as definitely as may be consistent with practical results.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I agree with that statement 100 percent. Nevertheless, I still believe in the McCarran amendment because I think it fully complies with that definition.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator and I agree upon one thing and we disagree upon another. That is the conclusion I reach. The Senator from Nebraska is half right any way. [Laughter.]

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. Hastings] said he has opposed the President's program because he thinks that all this fund should be definitely allocated in the joint resolution. There is a reason why that cannot be done and I propose to make that so plain that even the Senator from Delaware cannot fail to see it. [Laughter.]

I assert that if any Senator were called upon now to specify the projects to which these funds shall be applied he would probably be able to allocate one-tenth of the sum carried in the joint resolution in his own State or in the territory with which he is particularly familiar, and then he would be wholly unable to make a definite allocation of the remainder of the fund on a sound basis.

Just think for a moment! Of course we could say that $300,000,000 should be allocated for this purpose and $300,-000,000 for that purpose, but other Senators would not know and I should not know when that was said whether there was any real value in the provision.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the mayor of New York City has already taken $1,000,000,000.

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes; and the Senator from Delaware [Mr. Hastings] would take another billion.

Mr. HASTINGS. We could not handle that much in Delaware.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator says they could not handle that much in Delaware, but he does not know how much they could handle. He knows he would be utterly incapable now of allocating the fund and he knows the Committee on Appropriations could not do it. There is no Member of the Senate who would be more nearly qualified to do it than the handsome, genial gentleman who sits on my left, the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKellar], and he could not without months of study specify the purposes for which he would be willing to stand sponsor with reference to the expenditures to be made in the State of Tennessee.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly.

Mr. HASTINGS. May I suggest that under the terms of the joint resolution there is no provision whatsoever as to how all this money shall be expended. It may be used in the next year or perhaps it might be used in the next 50 years. Somebody has to decide and has to provide for the spending of the money. Who is going to do it? Does not someone know something about it somewhere, either the President or Secretary Ickes or someone else? Cannot we get some idea and write something into the joint resolution about how the money shall be expended, instead of leaving it so indefinite as it is?

Mr. ROBINSON. Oh, yes. I have stated that I thought | we might provide limitations in the joint resolution if it were thought advisable to do that, but it would not be of very much value. It would not help the program very materially. The Senator from Delaware, if he were called upon, would start the process of logrolling, and I would probably join him. [Laughter.] The result would be that we would put into the joint resolution projects which had not been investigated, projects about which only a few of us would know anything, projects which the Senate as a whole would be unable to approve.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President-

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. ADAMS. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that in the House the joint resolution as it originally came in specified certain kinds of projects, and those who were interested in having them specified were fearful lest some of the others would be left out. The result was that they eliminated, in the House, all efforts to specify.

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes. That is probably part of the genesis of this proposition. If the Senator from Colorado succeeded in getting recognition for his projects, and the Senator from Delaware failed to get recognition for his projects, the Senator from Delaware then would wish to make the terms general, and give the power to the President or someone else, in the hope that he would have a second chance of getting his projects recognized.

Mr. ADAMS. May I call the Senator's attention to the wording of the House joint resolution which was stricken

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly.

Mr. ADAMS. The House joint resolution provided that the President might spend the money, among other things, Slum clearance, rural housing, rural electrification, reforestation, soil erosion, blighted area and submarginal land reclamation, improvement of existing road systems and construction of national highways, grade-crossing elimination, Civilian Conservation Corps work, and other useful Federal or non-Federal work.

That, however, was thought to be not sufficiently inclusive. Mr. ROBINSON. Yes. Furthermore, Mr. President: It is not very valuable, because under the joint resolution all projects of that type can go forward if the President finds they are justified; and the description there is hardly specific enough to be of any very great value. I should be glad to see it made as specific as the circumstances permit without doing violence to the purposes of the legislation; and we must keep in mind the fact that the purposes of the legislation are twofold: First, to enable us to get rid of what we have come to know as the Federal relief system; second, to enable us to assure employment to all who are able to take employment during the further transition period when we are passing from depression into prosperity.

I have made these statements in the hope that we shall not get into a position of antagonism toward one another, in respect to the proposed legislation; that we may be able to do what Senators ought to do, namely, work out this problem in accordance with sound and approvable standards. It is desirable that the subject should be discussed; it is desirable that the conflicting viewpoints should be expressed; but I conclude with the declaration that if Senators insist on the payment of the prevailing wage to all the millions who are now out of employment, we shall not have sufficient funds, we shall be unable to obtain sufficient funds to give them all employment, and the primary purposes of the legislation will

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, I desire to speak briefly in response to the distinguished Senator from Arkansas [Mr. Robinson].

I decline to have the country confused, if I can prevent it, with the idea that in order to pay the prevailing wage it would be necessary to appropriate several billion dollars more. Under the President's plan to limit the income of the workers to $50 a month he could work them substantially 8 days a month at $6 per day; but what it was proposed to do was to work them substantially 12 days a month for $4 per day. So, practically, the distressed workers were to be required to give 4 days of their work a month more than a person in private industry would have to give.

The Senator says that the adoption of the prevailing-wage principle would require an increase of the appropriation. That I deny, and the Senator cannot prove it. What I do contend is that there would be every desire on the part of a man working 8 days a month on public works at $6 a day, $48 per month, to go back into private industry if he could get only 10 days' work there at $6 per day.

Mr. President, if the President of the United States should desire to limit these men to $50 a month, he could work them 8 days a month at $6 per day; and the man who could go back into private industry and get 10 days' work per month would be anxious to go back, because then he would get $60 a month. It is incorrect, inaccurate, and deceptive-not that I charge that the Senator from Arkansas intends it to be sobut it is deceptive to the public to intimate that the man who could get only $50 per month on public works would not be anxious to go back to private industry at $60 a month.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I desire to say only a few words with reference to this subject.

I think the Senate is apt to forget that neither in the message of the President to the Congress nor in any other statement has he said that the worker would receive only $50 a month. In the message of the President to the Congress, he declared that the wage should be set at a sum greater than the amount now being received by those upon the relief roll, but less than the prevailing wage. Time and again it was stated before the committee that the sum of $50 was nothing but an estimate—a guess, if you please the amount that would be an average of the payments made under this plan. It was pointed out that in some sections of the country the common laborer would receive compensation possibly of $25 a month, that in other sections of the country skilled laborers would receive $80, $90, or $100 a month.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BYRNES. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. When the Senator said "a month", did he mean that the laborer would work a whole month for those amounts?

Mr. BYRNES. I meant that he would receive $80, $90, or $100 a month, based upon the 130-hour month. That was the understanding I received from statements made to us.

Mr. COUZENS. One hundred and thirty hours a month?

Mr. BYRNES. Yes. Mr. COUZENS. And he would have to work 130 hours a month for $25?

Mr. BYRNES. Yes.

Mr. COUZENS. That is enough!

Mr. BYRNES. The Senator says "that is enough", but perhaps the Senator does not know that there are some sections, notably some rural sections in the South, where the common laborer does not receive as much as $25 a month, and when a farmer in those sections today seeks to employ a common laborer, he is told that the laborer prefers to lean on the "Cross", as the laborers refer to the Red Cross.

The relief administration does what they call "supplementing the budgetary deficiency." I want the Senator to understand that in those cases the man offered relief has a home on a farm, he is called upon to work at common labor, and in many instances is not paying rent. The relief agency supplements the income he has; and the amount that is paid to him in supplementing his income would approximate $25 a month.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to

Mr. BYRNES. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. It would not interfere with the program, as a matter of fact, to require a higher wage than prevails in the particular community. The whole trouble, it seems to me, is that there is a misinterpretation of what is the prevailing wage scale. I have heard it discussed on the floor of the Senate, and either I am exceedingly dense or someone else does not understand what is meant by the prevailing wage.

If the idea of the administration is to get as much work out of the individuals on relief as it is possible to get, for as low a wage as possible—and I do not believe it is—then it is inconceivable to me why they should want to keep out the provision for the prevailing wage.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, the Senator from Montana says that there is a difference of opinion as to the prevailing wage. Of course there is. There is a difference in the method that is followed in ascertaining it in every section of the country.

When the McCarran amendment was first offered, it was provided, in the language of the Davis-Bacon law, that whenever there was a dispute it should be referred to the Secretary of Labor for the determination of what was the prevailing wage in a community.

Throughout the country the prevailing wage has been ascertained in various ways. Committees are appointed which are representative of labor, representative of employers, and with a public representative in some communities, and by such committees the wage is established. In some places the hourly wage is exceedingly high, so high that it has interfered with private employers securing laborers.

I do not think, however, that that question is involved here to the extent the Senator from Montana thinks it is.

I was simply calling attention to the fact that the statement, reiterated constantly, as to $50 being the monthly wage for an employee, was nothing but the statement of one gentleman as to the means by which the sum of $4,000,000,000 was arrived at. The President of the United States has never said it in any message to Congress or in any message to the committee. On the contrary, he has said, in a letter to the Congress, that he would fix the wages throughout the Nation in such way as not to destroy the prevailing wage scale of the Nation. He asked the Congress to believe him when he said that he had been interested only in maintaining or in increasing the wage scale and was not interested in reducing it. I have confidence that in the administration of the law, the President in fixing wages throughout the Nation could do it in such manner as not to interfere with the prevailing wage scale.

The prevailing wage scale in approximately 20 of the areas in which building trades are affected is effected by a code agreement. Today there are pending in N. R. A. about 75 additional agreements, wherein employers and employees have agreed upon a wage scale. Approximately 20 have been approved by the Administrator of the N. R. A. Therefore, so far as the building trades are concerned, the scale of wages is fixed, and that scale of wages can be changed only by amending the code. An amendment to the code reducing the wage scale would have to receive the approval of the Administrator of the N. R. A.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BYRNES. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. Of course, those agreements would cease to exist if Congress failed to extend the N. R. A.

Mr. BYRNES. If Congress failed to extend the N. R. A. they would cease to exist, but so far as they now stand the wage scales are fixed; and they could not be changed except with the approval of the administration; and the administration says it is opposed to any reduction of the wage scale. So I really believe that gentlemen have been unduly alarmed if they fear that the President, notwithstanding his promise to the Congress that he would not do it, might do something that would adversely affect the wage scale.

We were told that by paying to young men in the C. C. C. camps a wage lower than was paid in the communities the wage scale would be adversely affected. That result did not follow, and I do not believe that if the money sought were spent to take people off the relief roll and give them jobs instead of cash and grocery orders it would necessarily result or would be likely to result in adversely affecting the wage scale in any community.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I had not intended to make any statement on this controversy at this time, but for several reasons I desire to do so.

In the first place, the statement has just been made that the President has promised to the Senate, and did promise before the Senate voted upon the amendment, that he would exercise the authority given in such a way that it would not affect the existing wage scale. In a number of instances, in the press and on the floor, the inference has been left that those who did not accept that statement thereby impliedly showed their distrust of the President's motives.

No such inference is justified. I fully believe that the President will do everything in his power to prevent breaking down the private wage scale. I believed it before he sent his letter, and I believe it yet. But the mere fact that he might attempt to prevent breaking down the private wage scale does not make it conclusive that he could accomplish that purpose. So it is perfectly consistent fully to agree that the President would attempt to prevent breaking down the private wage scale and at the same time support the amendment which was offered.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me? Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. Confirming what the Senator from Alabama has stated, the Senate will be interested to learn that a committee of the Senate investigating violations of the so-called "prevailing wage law", together with all abuses affecting labor under the Bacon-Davis law and under publicworks projects during the last 6 months, have brought to their attention over 300 cases alleging abuses in the violation of this law arising in all parts of the country.

Criminal prosecutions have followed in some cases through the efforts of the committee and the Department of Justice. Many other complaints have been referred to governmental departments for appropriate action. Thousands of dollars representing underpayments made to laborers employed on these public works have been repaid through the medium of the committee and the administrative officers of the Government.

The committee's files show the chief abuse is known as the "kick-back practice", namely, devious methods resorted to by employers to evade payment of the prevailing wage to the employees, thereby taking advantage of their distress and their eagerness for employment. The frauds practiced by the employers have been numerous and wide-spread, and almost every device that ingenuity could contrive has been resorted to to break down prevailing wage scales.

I state this at this time to indicate that notwithstanding the administration's desire to enforce the prevailing wage, nevertheless these abuses referred to above have continued more or less unabated until the light of publicity was thrown and is continued to be thrown upon these evil practices.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I thank the Senator. A statement has been made that a prophecy appeared with reference to the wages given to the boys in the C. C. camps, and that we were told that the wages paid to them would break down the prevailing wage. It is true that prophecy was made. I did not believe it, and I do not believe it yet. I will explain in a few minutes exactly how I distinguish in my own mind the wages paid the boys in the C. C. camps and wages paid in private industry, and decline at the same time to take the viewpoint that the payment of $50 to the boys in those camps would break down the prevailing wage scale. I did not believe it would, and do not believe it yet.

I want to state further that I fully agree with the statement of the leader on this side, whom I admire very greatly, that this matter should be worked out in such way as to assure the passage of a bill. I can state further that I think it should have been worked out before; I think it should have been worked out before the vote was taken upon the joint resolution.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? Mr. BLACK. I yield. Mr. BORAH. In view of the Senator's suggestion, would it not be well to bring the joint resolution back to the Senate and undertake to work out these problems? I have never understood why this bill was sent back to the committee upon the acceptance of one amendment.

Mr. BLACK. I may state to the Senator that I am perfectly willing for it to be undertaken either here or in the committee. I think it should be undertaken, and I think it can be done. I may state further that I fully agree with the statement made by the President in his message delivered in the House.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. CONNALLY. Do the Senators from Idaho and Alabama think that if the joint resolution were brought out on the floor there would be any different result than the result which has already occurred? I thought the measure had already been worked out here Friday, or worked over.

Mr. BLACK. I cannot say about that; but I do say it is my judgment that we can reconcile the views of those who have the same objective in mind without anyone stubbornly clinging to any one idea and giving to something a magnified importance which it does not deserve. I state that, in my judgment, an agreement could have been reached, can be reached, and should be reached, and that the joint resolution should be passed.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.
Mr. BORAH. There was an amendment proposed by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCarran] and that amendment was voted upon. It was adopted by 1 vote. That was not disposing of the bill. There were numerous ways in which to dispose of it. That was simply disposing of one amendment upon the bill. What I say is that the bill should be back here for consideration and worked out to a final result, and the bill itself either defeated or passed.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I agree entirely with the Senator that the joint resolution should be worked out and passed, and that speedily; but will the Senator suggest how we may reach a conclusion about it? The matter has gotten down to very narrow limits. It is largely a question of the McCarran amendment. How can we work it out?

Mr. BLACK. How long has the Senator from Tennessee been in the Senate? The Senator has been here a great deal longer than I have.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am a great believer in the ability of the Senator from Alabama, and I should like to have his suggestions. We have cooperated previously; I think we might cooperate again. I happen to be on the committee. I should like to have the suggestions of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. BLACK. I shall make some suggestions in a moment; but if there is a real, genuine desire to pass the joint resolution, when there has been only a 1-vote difference on an amendment, I am absolutely sure, and I am confident everyone else in the Senate is sure, that the joint resolution can and will be passed.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? Mr. BLACK. I yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. McCarran. I trust that the Senator from Alabama may yield for just a very short statement in keeping with the thought he is exploiting. I desire to say to the Senator from Alabama that while the joint resolution may be worked out, first of all it will have to be worked out for the protection of the wage structure of this country. Secondly, it cannot be worked out by using one arm of the press of the country as a bludgeon on the Members of the Senate.

Mr. BLACK. I hope that statement is correct. I can assure the Senator that it is correct with reference to certain Members.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? Mr. BLACK. I yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. CONNALLY. If the Senator from Nevada is correct, and if he represents the views of those who voted with him, there would be no other way of working this matter out except as it has worked out; so what is the use of bringing the joint resolution back before the Senate? In other words, the Senator from Nevada is strong for cooperation, but, as in the story of the lion and the lamb, when the cooperation is over the lamb is inside the lion.

Mr. BLACK. Yes, sir.

Mr. President, I desire to make one or two statements on the subject I started to discuss.

In the first place, I stated in the beginning that I was favorable to the ideas expressed by the President in his message. I favor doing away with the dole. I think it is a blight on the Nation. If we cannot do away with it by an adequate public-works program, then I favor requiring private industry to shorten its hours so as to give the people jobs instead of having the blighting and paralyzing influence of the dole.

I agree with the President in the statement he made that the aggregate wages paid to those engaged on public works should be smaller than the aggregate wages paid in private industry, in order that there may constantly remain a sufficient inducement for people to go into private industry if the time ever comes when there are any jobs therein.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him there?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. Is that not precisely what the amendment of the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. Russell] would do?

Mr. BLACK. No, Mr. President. I will explain that.

Mr. McKELLAR. As I understand his amendment, that is precisely the object sought to be attained by the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. BLACK. It may be the object, but I do not think it can be accomplished.

Mr. President, the question which then arises is, Shall we have a smaller wage than the prevailing one paid to those employed on public works? That is certainly the idea they have in the progressive country of Denmark. There, a man cannot be without a job. If he goes to a municipality and says, "I want work; I have no job", if he is healthy, they will give him a job at a little smaller aggregate rate than is paid by private industry. If he declines to take a job, they put him to work under a law which forces him to work at a still smaller wage than he would get on public works.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? Mr. BLACK. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WHEELER. I agree entirely with the idea the Senator has expressed. I have stated repeatedly that those who are working on emergency construction work for the Government should be paid an aggregate less than private industry pays; but if we pay them a daily wage less than private industry pays, we shall break down the scale of wages in this country.

Mr. BLACK. I am coming to that.

Mr. WHEELER. It seems to me it is perfectly childish for Senators to stand on the floor of the Senate of the United States and say, "We will not have any legislation unless we can have our way." If we have come to such a pass in the United States of America that the Senate cannot legislate unless it legislates according to someone's dictation, and someone stands up and says, "You will have to do this or you cannot have any legislation", it is time for the country and for the Senate to find it out.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I desire to express my great pleasure at hearing the sentiments expressed by the Senator from Montana. Of course, this problem ought to be worked out, and, in my judgment, it will be worked out. I join the Senator from Montana in hoping that no Senator will say, "Just because my plan cannot work, or I cannot have my way in this respect, we will have no legislation."

Mr. WHEELER. That should not occur, Mr. President. If the Senator will bear with me just a moment, I am whole-heartedly in favor of a public-works program. I say that one of two things must necessarily happen in this country, and it must happen very soon. Either the private industries of the country must put men to work, or else the Government of the United States must put them to workone of the two. I desire to see this proposed legislation pass, but I shall not vote for it under the crack of the whip, and with the statement, "Unless you vote for this measure in the way that I send it down here", or the way some leader or some supposed spokesman for the White House says it should be, "you will not have any legislation on the subject "-I say that kind of talk is childishness and shows a pevishness which ought not to exist in this body.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President-

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I wanted to get through.

Mr. McCARRAN. I shall not undertake to say anything which will delay the Senator; but it is in keeping with the expression of the Senator from Montana that on four occasions, pursuant to suggestions made by those who had the welfare of this measure at heart, I amended the joint resolution, the last two amendments being at the very hour the vote was taken.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, with reference to the general features of the joint resolution, I desire to state that I favor leaving to the President the fullest possible freedom of action in connection with the selection of the works which are to be availed of. I think anything else would be a handicap to the accomplishment of that which we desire. I do not think it is possible for us here to predict which work will be needed and which will not.

I favor the appropriation for the full amount provided in the joint resolution, and I am personally willing to vote for more than is provided in the measure. So it gets down to the single question as to a prevailing wage rate, which we have had up for discussion.

I emphatically assert that no one has a right to send any such news to the people of this country, that the payment of the prevailing wage rate will cost the Government one additional dollar. Those who make such a statement either know they are mistaken or they have not examined the facts. It will not cost the Government one additional dollar to adopt the prevailing wage rate. I challenge anyone on this floor to show that it will cost an additional dollar to adopt the prevailing wage rate.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, suppose the prevailing wage is adopted, and the person who is employed works only half the time. It is claimed by some that it would be just a part dole and a part work, because ordinarily the man who is employed works certainly 5 or 6 days a week, and to cut him down to 1 day a week would amount to a dole.

Mr. BLACK. I will answer that suggestion right now. If that statement be correct, then every wage earner in this country who today is working 1 day a week in private industry is getting a dole. If he is working 2 days a week, he is getting a dole. He gets a dole if he is paid less than his labor is worth. He does not get a dole if he works 1 day or 2 days a week at a reasonable rate of wages. That is not a dole.

No one contemplates, as I understand, that these people shall work 6 days a week, so what difference does it make so far as the Government is concerned whether they work 3 days a week or 5 days a week for their money if the object is employment? I admit that our object is to get the most public works we can. If the primary object of the legislation is to get the most public works possible, then we ought to work the people for the lowest wage possible to do the most public work possible, it is said. But that is not the object. I place as the chief object of the bill, so far as I give it my support, not the public works at the end of the program but the employment of people who are today without jobs and unable to make a living.

Let it be known once and for all that it will not cost the Government one additional dollar to adopt the amendment.

Mr. President, here is the reason why some of us think it would bring down the wage scale-I think so now and I thought so then: Let us suppose we put people to work constructing post-office buildings and other buildings in a city under a private contract, which could be done under about that. A contractor goes into a city and puts up a number of public buildings, paying people $1 a day or $2 a day when the regular rate is $5 a day or $6 a day. If that were done the natural tendency would be for other contractors to follow the same course. If this were simply a small program, such as the C. C. C. under which we were sending men into the country, into the hills and mountains, it would be an entirely different matter. I am thoroughly in favor of paying the C. C. C. men the wages we do pay them, with the board they get.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. BLACK. Certainly.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator stated that if a post-office building were constructed, mentioning that as a matter of illustration, and $1 a day were paid for such work, it would be unfair and unjust. I agree with the Senator entirely about that. Here is what the joint resolution provides:

In the event the President, or such official or agency of Government as he may select, shall determine after an investigation that the rate of wages paid is affecting adversely or is likely to decrease the prevailing rates of wages paid for any work of a similar nature in any city, town, village, or other civil division of a State * * the President * * shall immediately fix the rate of wages at an amount not less than the prevailing rate of wages paid for work of a similar nature in such locality.

My point is this: Does not the Senator believe that the President of the United States, who is given no discretion in the matter but is directed to see that the prevailing wage is not interfered with, will enforce the law?

Mr. BLACK. I do not think it could possibly be done unless it were provided that it should apply to certain kinds of work which we knew it would affect.

Mr. President, with reference to the passage of the joint resolution, let me say that I am sure the Senator from Tennessee, who has been here for many years, knows that there never has been a measure which was defeated on account of one amendment, whether there was only a difference of one vote between victory and defeat, if there was any administration sentiment for the bill. That could not happen. He knows further, without going into any details, that if it became apparent at any time that one amendment was about to destroy an entire measure, some method would be found, and could be found, to pass the measure.

Mr. McKellar. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Clark in the chair). Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator is asking me that question I shall take pleasure in answering it. I want to digress long enough, however, to say that so far as I can recall no bill advancing the interests of labor in this country has ever failed to receive my support since I have been in either body of the Congress. I feel that I can speak, therefore, with some assurance to labor when I say I think there can be an arrangement made and I believe there will be an arrangement made. I ask the Senator from Alabama what suggestion he has to offer which will help the committee to report out the joint resolution again so as to receive the approval of the Congress and so that we may go ahead with this much-needed work.

I agree with the Senator that we ought to discontinue the dole at the earliest possible moment. So far as I can see, the plan which has been suggested by the President of the United States and which was reported by the Committee on Appropriations is the best possible plan that has been submitted. For that reason I am supporting that plan. I hope the Senator will suggest something. If the amendment of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. Russell] does not suit him exactly let him suggest something else. He appears to be very much in sympathy with that amendment, the purpose of which was to make the wage such that it would not induce people to leave private employment and go into Federal Government employment. Since the Senator agrees with that purpose, then with his ingenuity, his skill, his ability the provisions of the joint resolution. There is no question as a lawyer, I am quite sure he can suggest some amendment to the Russell amendment which will carry out the purpose | of that amendment and bring about a unanimous or wellnigh unanimous support of this very worthy measure.

Mr. BLACK. I will state to the Senator that I agree with him in his statement with reference to his support of the people at work in this country. I think his record will verify that statement.

I do not intend at this time to make any definite statement as to an amendment which could be adopted and which would be acceptable. I am sure such an amendment can be offered. I am also absolutely sure that if the proper conferences had been held before the vote was taken and the proper method had been followed with reference to the consideration of the joint resolution, an agreement could have been reached by those who desire to protect the wage

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator will recall that I returned to the Senate on February 8, I believe it was, and from that time on took a very active interest in what was going on before the Appropriations Committee, of which I happen to be a member. I think every possible effort was made to adjust this matter so as to bring out a measure which we could all support. I know that Senators on that committee did their full duty. They voted, of course, their honest sentiments. They did their full duty in trying to bring out a measure which would receive the approval of the Senate. That was the principal issue before the committee. It was the principal issue before the Senate. Now the measure has gone back to the committee. Of course, if the Senator does not desire to make a suggestion at this time I shall ask him to submit it to the committee.

Mr. BLACK. I did make suggestions before this occurred. I made a number of suggestions.

Mr. McKELLAR. I did not hear the suggestions and I hope the Senator will repeat them. If he does not want to do so on the floor, I wish he would tell me privately.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I desire to conclude with

The gesture of sending the joint resolution back to the committee will not fool anybody. The joint resolution can be passed if it is desired that it shall be passed. That gesture, in my judgment, backed up by the statements of the Hearst organization—that great friend of the President which, a short time ago, had editorials with reference to the President of the United States that ought to make it improper to insert any of its editorials in the RECORD when it claims to defend the President-will amount to nothing. The joint resolution can be and will be passed if it is desired. I am for it. I want it passed. I want it passed for the entire amount of the appropriation carried by it; but I know that every Member of the Senate is too familiar with the procedure not to understand fully and completely that if it is desired that the joint resolution be passed, it will be passed.

Of course, if the desire is to have some editorials inserted in the RECORD with reference to those who voted for a certain amendment, and to have them deluged with telegrams and letters, and put them "on the spot", the joint resolution will be passed just the same; but, while I do not know, I have an idea that not many votes will be changed by any such method as that.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, as to that, of course, I have nothing to say; but I do desire to state to the Senator from Alabama that after hearing what he and the Senator from Montana [Mr. Wheeler] had to say this afternoon, I am quite convinced that there is no reason on earth why we cannot get together and pass a measure that will be satisfactory to them; and their two votes would pass this joint resolution.

Mr. BLACK. I may state one other thing, just as a matter of practical common sense:

The President stated, in effect, that he would veto the joint resolution with the McCarran amendment in it. A number of us who favored the joint resolution voted for the amendment with that statement here. I should un-hesitatingly vote to pass it over the President's veto, with for the McCarran amendment. Let there be no misunder-that provision in it, if there were enough votes to accomplish the purpose; but if there are not enough votes to accomplish the purpose I have been here long enough to know that the best thing one can do is to take as much as he can get of that which he wants.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator is certainly right.

Mr. BLACK. Everybody here knew that before the joint resolution was sent back to the committee.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, everybody in the Senate voted to send it back to the committee. It was a unanimous

Mr. BLACK. I did not vote for it. If there had been a record vote on the matter, I should have voted against it. I so stated.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not know whether the Senator was here or not.

Mr. BLACK. I was here when the statement was made that "without objection" the joint resolution would be recommitted; but I saw that it was useless to oppose it. I realized that it had been decided to send the joint resolution back to the committee, so it was all right with me: but I did not want anybody to be fooled into thinking that somebody else was fooled into thinking that that was anything but a gesture.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I will say that in my judgment the course that was taken was the best way to bring about a reconciliation of the various views and pass the measure. I am very much in favor of its passage. I think it should be passed and passed speedily; and if we can have some more expressions like those we have had this afternoon from the Senator from Alabama and the Senator from Montana I believe we can pass it.

Mr. BLACK. Those expressions are not simply expressions of this afternoon. They are expressions which could have been had before. They could have been had before the vote was taken.

All of us know that ordinarily, when there is a difference of one vote, some Senator gets up and makes a motion to reconsider. If that is not done, the measure goes to conference. The conferees do not make much noise over it, and the first thing we know something happens. In this case, however, the matter ostensibly had become so important that the joint resolution had to go back to the committee with a difference of one vote. Of course, it was not really so important as that. Everybody understands that if we want to pass the joint resolution, and if we have not decided—and I have not-to adopt the inhuman advice of the delegation at White Sulphur Springs, and permanently place on the rolls of this country people who must live permanently on a dole; if the mind of some Senator has not been changed so that he desires to follow that suggestion, the country need not fear. The Western Union Telegraph Co. may get a lot of money out of these telegrams. That is all right. Perhaps it needs the money. Perhaps the Postal Telegraph Co. needs to get some money from the telegrams that are coming here; but no one need be disturbed. The joint resolution will be passed if it is desired that it shall be passed. So far as I am concerned, I am for its passage.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. BLACK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WHEELER. I desire to say to the Senator that the impression has been sought to be created that by voting for the McCarran amendment, those of us who believe in organized labor and believe in keeping up the prevailing wage scale had killed the joint resolution. The truth about the matter is, as the Senator says, that it begins to look as if some of those who have been advocates of the joint resolution really want to see it killed.

Mr. BLACK. If the joint resolution is killed, they are the ones who killed it.

Mr. WHEELER. Yes; if the joint resolution is killed, the standing about it. If they take the position that they would rather have the dole than have work provided for those in need of it, let them take that responsibility.

STATE, JUSTICE, COMMERCE, AND LABOR DEPARTMENTS APPROPRIA-TIONS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5255) making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice and for the judiciary, and for the Departments of Commerce and Labor, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee, on page 1, line 9, which will be restated.

The amendment was, under the heading "Title I—Department of State—Collecting and editing official papers of Territories of the United States", on page 5, line 19, to strike out "$18,000" and insert "$23,030", so as to read:

For the expenses of collecting, editing, copying, and arranging for publication the official papers of the Territories of the United States, including personal services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, printing and binding, and contingent and traveling expenses, as provided by the act approved February 28, 1929 (U.S.C., Supp. VII, title 5, secs. 168–169), $23,030.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Salaries of Foreign Service officers", on page 8, at the end of line 5, to strike out "$3,150,000" and insert "$3,293,395", so as to read:

For salaries of Fureign Service officers as provided in the act approved February 23, 1931 (U. S. C., Supp. VII, title 22, secs. 3, 3a); salaries of Ambassadors, Ministers, consuls, vice consuls, and other officers of the United States for the period actually and necessarily occupied in receiving instructions and in making transits to and from their posts, and while awaiting recognition and authority to act in pursuance with the provisions of section 1740 of the Revised Statutes (U. S. C., title 22, sec. 121); and salaries of Foreign Service officers or vice consuls while acting as charges d'affaires ad interim or while in charge of a consulate general or consulate during the absence of the principal officer, $3,293,395.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under subhead "Cost of Living Allowance, Foreign Service Officers", on page 10, line 23, after the word "allowances", to strike out "and/or" and insert "and"; in line 24, after the word "officers", to strike out "and/or" and insert "and"; in line 25, after the word "allowances" to strike out "and/or" and insert "and"; on page 11, line 1, after the word "officers", to strike out "and/or" and insert "and"; and in line 3, after the word "allowances", to strike out "and/or" and insert "and", so as to read:

To carry out the provisions of the act approved February 23, 1931 (U. S. C., Supp. VII, title 22, secs. 12, 23c) relating to allowances and additional compensation to diplomatic, consular, and Foreign Service officers and clerks when such allowances and additional compensation are necessary to enable such officers and clerks to carry on their work efficiently: Provided, That such allowances and additional compensation shall be granted only in the discretion of the President, and under such regulations as he may prescribe, $200,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Miscellaneous Salaries and Allowances, Foreign Service", on page 11, line 25, before the word "leased", to strike out "and/or" and insert "and", so as to read:

For salaries or compensation of kavasses, guards, dragomans, porters, interpreters, prison keepers, translators, archive collators, Chinese writers, messengers, couriers, telephone operators, supervisors of construction, and custodial and operating force for maintenance and operation of Government-owned and leased diplomatic and consular properties in foreign countries; compensation of agents and employees of dispatch agencies at London, New York, San Francisco, Seattle, and New Orleans, including salaries during transit to and from their homes in the United States upon the beginning and after termination of service in foreign countries; operation of motor-propelled and other passenger and non-passenger-carrying vehicles; for allowances to consular officers, who are paid in whole or in part by fees, for services necessarily rendered to American vessels and seamen, as provided in the act of June 26, 1884 (U. S. C., title 22, sec. 89; title 46, sec. 101); and such other miscellaneous personal services as the President may deem necessary; $580,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 12, line 20, after the word "Navy", to strike out "and/or" and insert "and", so as to make the further proviso read:

Provided further, That the Secretary of the Navy is authorized, upon request by the Secretary of State, to assign enlisted men of the Navy and Marine Corps to serve as custodians, under the immediate supervision of the Secretary of State or the chief of mission, whichever the Secretary of State shall direct, at embassies, legations, or consulates of the United States located in foreign countries.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Contributions, quotas, etc.", on page 15, line 17, before the word "expenses", to strike out "and/or" and insert "and"; at the beginning of line 23, to strike out "$4,343" and insert "$4,342.50"; in line 24, after the word "tariffs", to strike out "$1,319" and insert "$1,318.77"; at the beginning of line 25, to strike out "$189,889" and insert "$189,888.58"; on page 16, line 2, after the word "arbitration", to strike out "$1,658" and insert "$1,658.25"; in line 5, after the name "Italy", to strike out "$48,441" and insert "$49,911"; in line 6, after the word "exceed", to strike out "$11,385" and insert "$12,885"; in line 7, after the word "than", to strike out "$6,000" and insert "$7,500"; in line 19, after the word "Bureau", to strike out "$30,438" and insert "$30,438.41"; in line 20, after the word "health", to strike out "$3,016" and insert "$3,015.62"; in line 23, after the word "Bureau", to strike out "$4,323" and insert "$4,323.20"; in line 24, after the words "Trade-Mark Bureau", to strike out "$14,330.20"; in line 25, after the words "industrial property", to strike out "$1,277" and insert "$1,277.47"; and on page 17, line 16, after the words "in all", to strike out "$805,000" and insert "$806,470", so as to read:

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I wish to offer an amendment to the committee amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment to the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 84, line 1, after the word "services", it is proposed to insert in parentheses the words "not exceeding $7.500 in the District of Columbia."

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I understand the law to be that unless the services in the District of Columbia are specified, there can be nothing spent for such a purpose in the District.

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course, in the case of appropriations such as this, the first thing that is generally done is to set up a division in the Department, which is usually continued for a number of years. The committee omitted this provision, with the view that the work might well be done in the field. I will say to the Senator, however, that I am willing to take his amendment to conference, and we will see whether or not any amount should be spent in the District.

Mr. FLETCHER. The amendments limit the amount to $7,500.

Mr. McKELLAR. I understand that to be so, but we do not want to set up another division in the department, and I hope that the Bureau of Fisheries will understand from what is being said on the floor of the Senate that we do not intend to let the division be established as a permanent one.

Mr. FLETCHER. I understand that. There will be need of a few extra clerks, not many, in the Bureau here in Washington.

Mr. McKELLAR. We will take the amendment to conference and work it out there.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator in charge of the bill whether the same amendment has not been included in appropriation bills heretofore?

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, yes; probably in all of them, and this is what has resulted: An organization is set up in the city of Washington, which sometimes remains here for a number of years after all the work is done, and the necessity for it has passed.

Mr. FLETCHER. The provision must be inserted in the bill; otherwise the money could not be spent in the District of Columbia.

Mr. McKELLAR. At all events, I am willing to take the matter to conference and work it out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I wish to suggest that on page 19 of the hearings on this bill before the House committee there was set forth a detailed and itemized statement of what the investigation would cost. It was estimated in the House that it would cost $500,000. I offered my amendment to provide for that amount, and the committee saw fit to cut it in two. I am wondering whether the Senator would allow the bill to be amended by inserting in line 3, $500,000 instead of $250,000, and $250,000 instead of $125,000. That would be in accordance with the estimates set forth in the hearings in the House.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, let me suggest to the Senator that a roll call was had in the committee on such a proposal, if I remember correctly, and the committee by a rather decisive vote voted it down. Under those circumstances I should like to retain the language as it is, and I believe the Senator can accomplish his purpose in this way. As I understand, the bill which has passed provides for $500,000; $125,000 presently appropriated is certainly enough to start the work. After it shall have been started, if it is found to be necessary, we will have ample time to make a deficiency appropriation, and I will assist the Senator at that time if it is found necessary.

Mr. FLETCHER. Under those circumstances, I will not press the matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations.

The next amendment was, under the heading "Title IV—Department of Labor—Office of the Secretary", on page 91, line 21, after the figures "$2,500" to insert a comma and "which amount shall be immediately available", and on page 92, line 8, after the figures "$95,000" to strike out the comma and "of which $2,500 shall be immediately available", so as to read:

Contingent expenses: For contingent and miscellaneous expenses of the offices and bureaus of the Department, for which appropriations for contingent and miscellaneous expenses are not specifically made, including the purchase of stationery, furniture and repairs to the same, carpets, matting, oilcloths, file cases, towels, ice, brooms, soap, sponges, laundry, street-car fares not exceeding $200; purchase, exchange, maintenance, and repair of motorcycles and motor trucks; purchase and exchange (not exceeding $2,500, which amount shall be immediately available), maintenance, operation, and repair of a motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicle, to be used only for official purposes; freight and express charges; newspaper clippings not to exceed $1,200, postage to foreign countries, telegraph and telephone service, typewriters, adding machines, and other labor-saving devices; purchase of law books, books of reference, newspapers and periodicals, not exceeding $4,500; contract stenographic services; all other necessary miscellaneous items and expenses not included in the foregoing; and not to exceed $25,000 for purchase of certain supplies for the Immigration and Naturalization Service; in all, $95,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Immigration and Naturalization Service", on page 95, line 13, after the word "exceed", to strike out "$22,600" and insert "$36,000", so as to make the further proviso read:

Provided further, That not to exceed $36,000 of the total amount herein appropriated shall be available for allowances for living quarters, including heat, fuel, and light, as authorized by the act approved June 26, 1930 (U. S. C., Supp. VII, title 5, sec. 118a), not to exceed $1,700 for any person:

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That completes the committee amendments.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read. The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 35, line 19, after the numerals "$25,000", it is proposed to insert the words " and in addition thereto $6,000 for printing records in Indian claim cases."

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, there are pending before the Court of Claims a great number of Indian cases. These claims have been filed by Indian tribes residing in all parts of the United States. The claims are now being prepared for hearing, and there is not sufficient money in the printing fund of the Court of Claims to do anything toward printing the records. The little item of $6,000 is proposed to be inserted for the purpose of assisting the Court of Claims and the attorneys in the preparation of those cases, and to get the cases ready for presentation to the court. I ask the chairman of the committee to let the item go into the bill and see if he can get it agreed to in conference.

Mr. McKELLAR. A parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. McKELLAR. Is this amendment subject to a point of order? I have no objection to following the plan suggested by the Senator from Oklahoma if it is in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of opinion that the amendment would be subject to a point of order.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, that is what I desired to inquire about. I will inquire of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. Thomas] if an estimate for this item has been made by the Budget Bureau?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I cannot answer that question. This matter was brought to my attention by attorneys representing Indian tribes who stated that they are handicapped in the preparation of their cases because there is no money available for this purpose in the Court of Claims.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I appreciate that the contention has much merit, but I am trying to find out the preliminary status. I understand that the item has not been reported by either the House or the Senate committee.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I think that is correct.

Mr. McNARY. It is not supported by a Budget estimate?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I think that is correct.

Mr. McNARY. And it does not carry out existing law?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Of course, I cannot put my finger on the law authorizing "it; but the Court of Claims itself has authority to ask for money for printing purposes, and in this amendment I am only asking that $6,000 be made available, under the general authority, for this particular purpose. Whether or not it is specifically authorized I cannot say; but no harm can be done by letting the amendment go to conference; and if it is not authorized, or if for any good reason it should not be included in the bill, I shall have no complaint. The matter was brought to me only recently. I did not have much time to look into it. It should have been presented to the committee sooner.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not raise the point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. Thomas].

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is open to further amendment.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I desire to call attention to the first word in line 25 on page 10. I have been requested to offer an amendment striking out the word "clerks" and inserting "American employees." However, I understand that would be a change in the law; that the law does not provide for payment to any employees other than clerks, and for that reason I feel precluded from offering the amendment. I think the amendment is a just amendment, and I think the provision ought to be applied to all American employees.

Mr. McNARY. Does the Senator propose that the amendment should be inserted in the bill?

Mr. McKELLAR. The words I have suggested should be inserted in lieu of the word "clerks" in line 25, on page 10, I will say to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. McNARY. How does the Senator propose to change the language?

Mr. McKellar. By substituting for the word "clerks" the words "American employees." I am informed, however, that the law provides for the payment of this allowance only to clerks, and not to other employees, and I am loath to put anything in the bill which would have the effect of changing existing law.

Mr. McNARY. Is not that the language which has been carried from year to year by the bill?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; and that is the language of the law, as I am informed.

Mr. McNARY. I thought the language in the bill was the same language that has been carried and is carried in different statutes.

Mr. McKELLAR. It is.

Mr. McNARY. Then the Senator proposes to modify the language in this bill?

Mr. McKELLAR. I am not making a proposal about it. I am merely stating it. I desire to say to the Senate that in my judgment this cost-of-living allowance ought to apply to all employees, and not simply to clerks, and if it were in order I should propose the amendment, because I think it would be right; but I am explaining that I think we are precluded from making that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee offer the amendment?

Mr. McKELLAR. No; I do not offer the amendment.

Mr. McNARY. I should have to object to it if it were offered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no further amendments to be proposed, the question is, Shall the amendments be engrossed and the bill be read a third time?

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGE REFERRED

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CLARK in the chair) laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States submitting several nominations in the Regular Army, which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

(For nominations this day received, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. McKELLAR, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably the nomination of Edwin H. Goodwin to be postmaster at Plainfield, N. J., in place of E. H. Bird.

Mr. LOGAN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported favorably the nomination of Bunk Gardner, of Kentucky, to be United States attorney for the western district of Kentucky, to succeed Thomas J. Sparks, whose term expired February 7, 1935.

Mr. McGILL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported favorably the nomination of John J. Farrell, of Minnesota, to be United States marshal, district of Minnesota, to succeed Bernard Anderson, whose term expired February 23, 1935.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reports will be placed on the Executive Calendar.

POSTMASTERS

The legislative clerk proceeded to read the nominations of sundry postmasters.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask unanimous consent that the nominations of postmasters on the calendar be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations of postmasters are confirmed en bloc.

IN THE ARMY

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations in the Army. Mr. McKELLAR. I ask unanimous consent that the Army nominations on the calendar be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations in the Army are confirmed en bloc.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. In the Marine Corps, has the name of Gen. Richard P. Williams been passed over?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from Oregon that at the request of the Senator from Florida [Mr. Trammell] the other day, by unanimous-consent agreement, which apparently was not entered on the calendar, it was agreed that the nominations of General Williams and General Russell should be passed over until a day certain, which was later to be fixed.

Mr. McNARY. Then, I should say the nomination of General Williams is legitimately on the calendar, with no time fixed for its consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That would seem to be the situation.

Mr. McNARY. I ask the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. Robinson] whether any effort is being made to fix a time to dispose of the nomination of General Williams?

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I do not understand that any agreement has been reached by those who have been active in the consideration of the nominations. I am of the opinion that the Senate should proceed to the consideration of the nominations. I know of no reason why that should not be done tomorrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from Oregon that on last Friday, when the present occupant of the chair was temporarily in the chair, the nominations of both General Williams and General Russell were confirmed, and on the motion of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. Black], that action was later reconsidered, and the understanding was apparently reached by all Senators present that the nominations should be passed over until an agreement could be reached for their consideration on a day certain.

Mr. McNARY. I well recall that the nominations were confirmed, but I did not know that a motion to reconsider had been made. I thank the Chair.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I inquire whether it is contemplated that these nominations shall be taken up in the early future, and whether they may not be taken up tomorrow?

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I may state that there are a large number of nominations now pending before the Naval Affairs Committee. These nominations were made on the recommendation of a board of which General Russell was chairman. It is my contention that this was practically a one-man board—such is the information which has been given me by the officers of the Marine Corps—and I have asked that a public hearing be granted before that committee, with the appropriation of a sufficient amount of money to summon witnesses in order that this whole matter may be gone into. I have made that request of the Senator from Florida [Mr. Trammell], and asked him to place it before the committee.

I may state, in that connection, that I have made that request because numerous officers in the Marine Corps have come to me and have said they were afraid to testify. I have had numerous letters saying the same thing. They claim that this board was created by General Russell for the benefit of his friends; that those who served on the board were, in the main, his subordinates in the office here. From the information which has come to me, it is my belief that these charges should be investigated by the Naval Affairs Committee, or some other committee, in order to find out whether or not these officers are correct in their statements. I know that many officers have told me that there is a perfect reign of terror in the Marine Corps; that they are afraid to testify before the committee; that the only way they would testify would be if they were summoned as witnesses.

I should like to have the matter referred to the Naval Affairs Committee, or some other committee if the Naval Affairs Committee prefers that it should go to some other committee, and I should like to have a sufficient appropriation to permit summoning Marine officers far and wide, and letting them state before the committee the facts which almost any of them will state to any Senator if he will call the officers before him. That is what I should like to have done, and that is what I have asked to have done with reference to the selections which are being made by the board. I had hoped that until that was done these promotions would not be passed upon.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?
Mr. BLACK. I yield the floor. I was answering the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator from Florida [Mr. Trammell], the Chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee, is not present at this moment, and for that reason I do not anticipate that any action can be taken this afternoon. I suggest, therefore, that the nominations go over without prejudice.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations will be passed over without prejudice.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. ROBINSON. As in legislative session, I move that the Senate adjourn until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate (at 4 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.), in legislative session, adjourned until tomorrow, Tuesday, February 26, 1935, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 25, 1935

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Blessed be the Lord, God of all truth. We pray that we may know more of the inspiration of its vision and rapture. May they quicken and blend our moral dispositions and our conduct and touch the finest qualities of our souls. O Spirit of God, inspire the furthermost reaches of our minds and sanctify the most sacred affections of our breasts. Thou, whose mercy never fails, we praise Thee for the royal law of divine love. We wait in prayer, O Lord. We would bend a little lower at Thy altar; we would have no trumpet to sound our civic virtues, for our city is the travail of reproach. As its example and influence are felt to the ends of the earth, Almighty God, direct and stimulate all agencies which are seeking to break the manacles of lawlessness. Do Thou mold the statue of its soul; enter the very temple of its heart until all arteries are cleansed of their scrofula of crime and shame. Preserve our good name, consecrate our wealth, sweeten our labor, and bless abundantly our home life until we are heralded as a city of our God. In the Redeemer's name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday, February 22, 1935, was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House that on February 20, 1935, the President approved and signed bills of the House of the following titles:

H. R. 3247. An act to provide for loans to farmers for crop production and harvesting during the year 1935, and for other purposes; and

H. R. 3018. An act to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the St. Lawrence River at or near Alexandria Bay, N. Y.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read an announcement. The Clerk read as follows:

Pursuant to the authority conferred upon him by House Resolution 127 the Chair desires to inform the House that he did on February 22 sign the enrolled bill of the Senate of the following title: (S. 1190) "To regulate interstate and foreign commerce in petroleum and its products by prohibiting the shipment of such commerce of petroleum and its products produced in violation of State law, and for other purposes."

BLACK-CONNERY 30-HOUR BILL

Mr. MERRITT of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a petition signed by several hundred employees of the Bullard Co., one of the principal manufacturing companies in Bridgeport, Conn., opposed to the Black-Connery 30-hour bill, in which they say—

It is our understanding and belief that said bill, if passed, would be a detriment to business as a whole, and in place of being a vehicle to aid unemployment, would tend to lengthen the depression instead of bringing it to a happy end.

That is signed by several hundred employees of the Bullard Co.

I ask to present that petition.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. Merritt] presents a petition which will be referred to the appropriate committee.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. COLDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks on the subject of the I. L. O. and the worker, and I desire to include the preamble of part 13 of the Treaty of Versailles; also a part of the resolution of the I. L. O. in accepting the membership of the United States; and also a brief extract of a story of the results of the I. L. O. upon children working in Persia in the making of carpets and rugs.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Reserving the right to object, will the gentleman tell us what it is he intends to include in his remarks? I did not understand the gentleman.

Mr. COLDEN. To include the preamble of part 13 of the Treaty of Versailles, which sets up the I. L. O.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. What is the I. L. O.?

Mr. COLDEN. The International Labor Organization of Geneva, Switzerland. It also includes a short paragraph from the invitation which the I. L. O. extended to the United States at the time the bill was passed in the House about a year ago. I also want to insert a short story concerning the influence which the I. L. O. had in correcting the abuse of child labor in Persia in the manufacture of rugs.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Who wrote this article to which the gentleman refers?

Mr. COLDEN. The story was written by Professor-

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I am going to object.

Mr. COLDEN. It is very brief.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I object for the time being, Mr. Speaker.

SOIL EROSION

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 minutes.

gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. Speaker, you have recently read in the Washington papers about the dust storms that are starting their yearly progress over the western plains. happen to represent a district that is in the direct path of those destructive storms. If a foreign enemy were doing to our country what those winds are doing, we would spend untold millions to try to stop him. We have spent millions for the control of pests, but if we continue to allow that country to be eroded by wind it will be utterly destroyed. and that vast breadbasket of the United States will cease to produce anything and will have to be abandoned.

I wish to call attention to the fact that we have a soil erosion service under the direction of Mr. Bennett that has done marvelous work in finding ways and means to combat this destructive wind and water erosion in that country.

I also want to call attention to the fact that that service comes to an end on the 17th day of June unless this House makes some appropriation for the continuation of the service. Unless that is done, it will die, and that country will become a desert waste. They have under consideration a program that would require the expenditure of $36,000,000 to prevent that wind erosion. I know of no money that could be expended to better advantage than trying to save that soil from utter destruction. When that legislation is prepared and comes before this House, I hope it will receive serious consideration. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

LIGHT AND POWER RATES COMPARED-T. V. A., TACOMA, WASH .. ONTARIO, CANADA-BOULDER DAM AND MUSCLE SHOALS

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a radio broadcast made by me, the Senator from Washington, Senator Bone, and the gentleman from California [Mr. Colden].

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I insert the following radio broadcast:

My friends of the radio audience, I first wish to thank the National Broadcasting Co. and associated radio stations for setting aside this half hour once a week for Members of Congress to discuss with you the great problems with which we are now conferenced.

Among the greatest of these problems is the power question. Electricity is no longer a luxury; it is a necessity. No well-equipped home of the future, whether in the city or on the farm, will be without electric light and power.

Unfortunately, the power resources of this country have been so used, or so manipulated as to deprive millions of Americans of any use of electric energy at all and to impose upon the rest of us rates so high, so unreasonable, and so exorbitant that the average citizen has never been able to enjoy the full benefits of electricity or the adequate use of electrical appliances.

I placed in the Congressional Record tables showing typical electric light and power bills in every city in the United States of 50,000 population or over (Congressional Record, Tuesday, Feb. 12, p. 1864). A careful examination of those tables shows a vast spread between the rates charged in various localities. Especially does it show a vast spread between the T. V. A. rates, the Canadian rates, the prevailing rates in Tacoma, Wash., and the rates charged by private power companies.

The passage of the Muscle Shoals bill, creating the T. V. A., was one of the most important steps from an economic standpoint ever taken by this or any other Government. It was the beginning of a movement to save to the American people the almost unlimited supply of hydroelectric power in our navigable streams—by far the greatest source of natural wealth in all the world outside of the soil from which we live.

The passage of that measure, as everyone knows, was due largely to the persistent efforts of my distinguished friend, Senator George W. Norris, of Nebraska, who deserves the lasting gratitude of the American people for the great services he has rendered in this battle for justice to the ultimate consumers of electric lights and power, in which he has been as "* * constant as the northern star, of whose true, fixed, and resting quality there is no fellow in the firmament."

By establishing its "yardstick" rates, and informing the American people what rates should be charged for lights and power, based upon the actual cost of production and distribution, the Tennessee Valley Authority has aided every single human being in America who pays an electric-light bill and has started a movement to electrify the farm homes of the country which, if properly

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the | carried out, will make this the most wonderful country in all the world.

There has been so much said about the Tennessee Valley Au-There has been so much said about the Tennessee Valley Authority, especially by its critics, that the average citizen does not understand that it represents a great national policy through which we expect to reach every section of the country. Muscle Shoals is the greatest public power project in America now in operation. There is another one being constructed in the far West, however, that will surpass anything of its kind that has so far been attempted. I refer to Boulder Dam.

I see here in the room with me my friend, Hon. CHARLIE COLDEN, a Member of Congress from California, who is intensely interested in this question, and especially in the Boulder Dam development. He has been a pioneer in this power fight, and I am going to ask him at this time to give you some information on Boulder Dam. Charlie, tell us something about the Boulder Dam project.

Mr. Colden, Mr. Rankin, I thank you for this invitation, for you appreciate how modest we Californians are in talking about our home State.

our home State.

But talking about dams; the Boulder Dam is the highest in the world. It is 726 feet from the foundation rock to the highway on the crest. It is much higher but much shorter than the Muscle Shoals Dam. It is only about 1,180 feet long at the crest. It is 660 feet wide at the base and 45 feet wide at the top. Enough concrete was used in the Boulder Dam to build a standard paved highway 16 feet wide from Miami, Fla., to Seattle, Wash. It is estimated that the Boulder Dam power plant will produce 1,835,000 horsepower, which is more than four times as much as produced on the American side of Niagara Falls. The capacity of the Boulder Dam power plant is about seven times that of Muscle Shoals at the present time and three times as great as the ultimate capacity of Muscle Shoals.

The entire expense of the construction of the Boulder Dam, the power plant, and the all-American canal, amounting to $165,-000,000 will be repaid, including the interest at 4 percent, in a period of 50 years, from the sale of the power alone.

Los Angeles already has one of the outstanding publicly-owned power and light systems of the country. When the aqueduct was constructed to bring water to the city of Los Angeles, from the mountain tops 240 miles away, our people had a vision of using this flow of water for the production of light and power for the use of the citizens of Los Angeles. Not only has this city power enterprise financed itself for the most part but it has given the city of Los Angeles one of the lowest power rates enjoyed by any of the industrial centers of our country. But talking about dams; the Boulder Dam is the highest in the chterprise infanced itself for the most part but it has given the city of Los Angeles one of the lowest power rates enjoyed by any of the industrial centers of our country.

For instance, 100 kilowatt-hours per month in Los Angeles cost $3.31, while in Newark, N. J., the cost is $5.30, and in Brocklyn, N. Y., $5.55.

Boulder Domestin Standard Company of the cost is $5.30, and in Brocklyn, N. Y., $5.55.

N. Y., $5.55.

Boulder Dam will provide even lower rates for light and power than at present. It is of particular importance to the farmer and fruit grower. So much of the Southwest is semiarid that the pumping of water enters into rural economy much more than into any other part of the country's economy. Boulder Dam will be a boon to both the farmer and the fruit grower, will cut down his costs, and relieve him and his housewife of many of the drudgeries of rural life.

But, Mr. Rankin, the power development is but half the story of the Boulder Dam. It will not only furnish domestic water for many cities of southern California but also control the disasmany cities of southern California but also control the disastrous floods in the basin of the lower Colorado. There will be sufficient water stored behind this dam to cover an area of the size of New York or Pennsylvania, or your own State of Mississippi, about 1 foot deep. It will irrigate 2,000,000 acres of as fertile land as can be found on the globe. A pessimist has predicted that the Boulder Dam will fill with silt in 150 years. But Will Rogers says, "No use to worry about that now; and then the Republicans may be back in power by that time."

Mr. RANKIN, I doubt that.

Mr. COLERN, you gave us a wonderful description of that marvel.

Mr. Colden, you gave us a wonderful description of that marvel-ous project. If you can catch a vision of this vast wealth of electric energy sent pulsing through the country and delivered to the ulti-mate consumers at rates they can afford to pay, then you may realize that we are in the beginning of a new era in the advancement of our civilization.

I want to discuss light and power rates now for just a moment. You know, they keep telling you that the "yardstick" rates of the Tennessee Valley Authority are too low, and that the Government is losing money on them. Of course that is not true. The T. V. A. rates are really higher than the rates in Ontario, Canada, where they have public ownership, and are higher than the rates in Tacoma, Wash., where they have had a public power system for more than 20 years.

We have with us in the offer have

We have with us in the office here my friend, Senator Homer T. Bone, from the State of Washington, who lives in the city of Tacoma. Senator Bone is one of the pioneers in this power fight. He is the father of the Tacoma project and is familiar with every phase of its development.

Senator Bone, tell us something about that wonderful plant you have at Tacoma.

Senator Bone. The city of Tacoma, Wash., has been in the power business for a great many years. It now owns three hydroelectric plants with an installed generating capacity of 157,000 horsepower. In addition, and for "stand-by" purposes, it owns two modern steam generating plants with a capacity of 45,000 horsepower. This makes a total of 202,000 horsepower now available at all times. While the municipal plant is carried on the city's books at a depreciated value of somewhere around $22,000,000, I have no hesitancy in saying that practically any private power company would value it, under modern practices, for at least $30,000,000 for rate-making purposes. I think the city of Tacoma has one of the finest power systems on the globe. It will probably startle a lot of folks to learn that it has never cost the taxpayers of the city of Tacoma one penny. That magnificent power system has been paid for out of plant earnings. The charge so glibly repeated been paid for out of plant earnings. The charge so glibly repeated by Power Trust spokesmen that plants like that of Tacoma operate to the disadvantage of the taxpayers meets a full, complete, and convincing answer in the record of the Tacoma plant. It is operated as a separate business institution. The plant personnel is under civil service. Not only has it never been in politics, but it has never been charged with being in politics. The provisions of the city charter would remove a man in the light department who dabbled in politics.

This remarkable plant has made a net profit on operations of nearly $1,000,000 in 1 year, and this in the face of the fact that it was then selling the cheapest light and power in the United States. The Tacoma plant is an example of what people can do for themselves when they have a little vision and a little civic Certain city officials render some service to the light system. These officials are the city treasurer, who handles the light department's accounts; the city comptroller, who audits its accounts; and the city attorney, who represents it in a legal way. counts; and the city attorney, who represents it in a legal way. For these services the light department contributes from its own funds 25 percent of the cost of operating these three offices. It also rents its offices in the city hall, paying rental therefor as any private agency might do. In addition to these contributions, the light department pays 7½ percent of its gross revenues into the city treasury every year in lieu of taxes. Out of every dollar the light department takes in, 7½ cents goes to the general fund of the city to help the general taxpayers. That contribution is now 12 percent or more of the city budget. And all of this in the face of the fact that the citizens of Tacoma cet the cheapest light and power rates in this country. But get the cheapest light and power rates in this country. But that is not all of the story. Tacoma is one of the best lighted cities in the United States. The city council compels the municipal power system to furnish street lights and all replacements for about one-half of the actual cost of the service, ments for about one-half of the actual cost of the service, which is another way of helping taxpayers and adding to the financial burdens of the plant.

Tacoma is in some ways unique in the matter of street lighting when contrasted with most other American cities. For the payment of a few dollars for each 25-foot lot in the residential districts, the city will install an ornamental light system on the street and thereafter maintain it without further cost to the home owners. One can drive mile after mile on well-lighted Tacoma streets, because the home owners on those streets have had this modern, ornamental light system installed.

Another glib charge of private power companies is that plants had this modern, ornamental light system installed.

Another glib charge of private power companies is that plants such as Tacoma's operate under a hit-or-miss accounting system. That is merely another of the polite bedtime stories of Power Trust propagandists. The Tacoma Light System is compelled to conform to the accounting system prescribed by State law, which is rigorous, to say the least, and requires a segregation and break-down of figures which leaves no loopholes to encourage loose financial operations.

Mr. Rankin. Senator Bone, the charge is frequently made that the T. V. A. rates are too low. Forty kilowatt-hours a month under the T. V. A. rates would cost a householder $1.20. What would that cost a householder in Tacoma, Wash.?

Senator Bone. $1.45. The first 30 kilowatt-hours a month costs 4½ cents each, and the next 800 kilowatt-hours 1 cent per kilowatt-hour, and 5 mills per kilowatt-hour for the balance. For instance, 150 kilowatt-hours per month in Tacoma would cost $2.55, whereas, under your T. V. A. rates at Tupelo, Miss., we will say, the cost would be $3.50; while in Ontario, Canada, where they have had public-ownership production and distribution of power for many years, the cost would be only $2.19.

Mr. Rankin. Then, as I understand you, 150 kilowatt-hours a month would cost $3.50 under the T. V. A. rates, $2.55 under the Tacoma rates, and $2.19 under the Canadian rates?

Senator Bone. That is right. Now look at your rates and see Senator Bone. That is right. Now look at your rates and see what that would cost in other sections of the United States.

Mr. Rankin. Well, in Brooklyn, N. Y., the cost would be $8.90; in Boston, Mass., $6.70; in Hartford, Conn., $5.50; in Providence, R. I., $7.30; in Jackson, Miss., $6.40; in Little Rock, Ark., $6.60.

Senator Bone. Then, in all those places the cost would be more than twice as great as it would in Ontario, Canada, or in Tacoma, Wash.

Mr. Rankin. Yes, Senator, and the more power used the greater the difference in cost seems to be. For instance, 500 kilowatthours a month costs $6.90 under the T. V. A. rates, while the mean average rate in more than 20 typical cities in the United States is

Senator Bone. In Tacoma, Wash., it would cost only $6.05, and the average throughout Ontario, Canada, would be $5.63.

Mr. RANKIN. Senator, I wonder how that is possible; 500 kilowatt-hours a month in Boston, Mass., costs $12.70; in Brooklyn, N. Y., $25.55; in New Orleans, La., $14.50; and in Little Rock, Ark., $14.60. Why is it that in Canada it costs only $5.63 and in Tacoma only $6.05?

Senator Bone. Well, primarily because the rates in Tacoma and in Canada are based strictly on the cost of production and distribution. They have no watered stocks; they pay none of the enormous salaries the power companies and their holding companies pay; they waste no money on propaganda; and therefore they are able to furnish lights and power at rates based upon cost they are able to furnish lights and power at rates based upon cost of production and distribution.

Mr. Rankin. Well, I have investigated the Canadian system to some extent, and I find that it is in good financial condition, but the contention is being made by the power companies that the Tacoma plant is losing money. What about that?

Senator Bone. I have not seen any printed assertions by private Senator Bone. I have not seen any printed assertions by private power companies that the Tacoma system was losing money. On the contrary, private power companies have offered all sorts of ingenious explanations for the fine financial record of the Tacoma plant. Some attribute it to the fact that we have very magnificent hydroelectric plants. Others say that the system is merely favored by nature and was able to build cheaply. A charge that the Tacoma power system is losing money would provoke a laugh from any well-informed person in that city. One of the reasons why private power companies are now continuously under fire is because they gilbly make assertions of that kind which are not why private power companies are now continuously under fire is because they glibly make assertions of that kind which are not only untrue but reflect upon the intelligence of the person making such a charge. The records of the Tacoma system are open to any investigator, and it is interesting to note that in many articles written about power systems of the country by apologists for private ownership, the city of Tacoma has been referred to as an exception to the rule which they announce applies to public ownership. The proof that the Tacoma power system is financially successful to a remarkable degree may be found in the writings of these private power publicity agencies.

Mr. Rankin. That is certainly interesting. I know the T. V. A. is not losing money on its rates; and, in fact, I am of the opinion that those rates will be reduced as time goes on.

Mr. COLDEN. Mr. RANKIN, I notice you have a program of rural

Mr. Colden. Mr. Rankin, I notice you have a program of rural electrification down in the Tennessee Valley that includes the sale of electrical appliances; what does that amount to?

Mr. Rankin. Mr. Colden, we are working out a plan of rural electrification through which we hope to reach every farm home in the United States ultimately. We have several counties in northeastern Mississippi and northern Alabama in which we are getting eastern Mississippi and northern Alabama in which we are getting rural lines constructed and giving those farmers electric lights and power at T. V. A. rates. In my opinion, this is the greatest back-to-the-farm movement we have ever witnessed. When you give those farmers cheap electricity, it will make their homes more pleasant, more attractive, and, as President Roosevelt says, it will make farm life more profitable and more abundant. I am making a drive now to electrify every farm home in the district I represent, and I wish every other Congressman and Senator would adopt the same program. If we could electrify every farm home in America, it would do more for the future of this country than any other one step that could possibly be taken at this time.

other one step that could possibly be taken at this time.

Senator Bone. But, Mr. Rankin, many of our farmers, and especially those down in Mr. Colden's State of California, would use more than 500 kilowatt-hours of electricity a month—where they have to pump water, run their feed mills, and so forth. Say a farmer used 1,000 kilowatt-hours a month, what would that cost him?

Mr. Rankin. Under the T. V. A. rates, it would cost him $8.90; and I see from the tables that that would cost $10.13 in Canada. In Maine, it would cost $41.89; in Iowa, $46.50; in Pennsylvania, $38.00; in Arkansas, $35.90; and in Virginia, $45.50.

Senator Bone. In Tacoma, Wash., it would cost $11.05.

Mr. Rankin. Senator, it hardly seems possible to have such wide-spread differences in light and power rates. Are you sure you don't make those rates up on the commercial consumers?

Senator Bone. No, Mr. Rankin; the commercial rate is just the same. For instance, 350 kilowatt-hours a month in the average city in the United States served by private power company, would be $19.58. In Tacoma it would be $11.25. While in Ontario, Canada, it would be $7.74.

be $19.58. In Tacoma it would be $11.25. While in Ontario, Canada, it would be $7.74.

Mr. Rankin. Well, under the T. V. A. rates it would be exactly $11.00. But say a merchant uses 750 kilowatt-hours a month of electric energy; under the T. V. A. rates that would cost him $19.25, while the average cost in cities served by private companies throughout the country would be $37.69. What would be the cost in Tacoma and Ontario?

Senator Bone. In Tacoma, $22.50, and I have the Canadian rates which show it would only cost $15.48 in Ontario.

Mr. Rankin. No wonder the American people are becoming aroused over the power question.

aroused over the power question.

I neglected to answer Mr. Colden's question about the Electric

I neglected to answer Mr. Colden's question about the Electric Home and Farm Authority which has been organized by the Tennessee Valley Authority, to assist the consumers of electric energy in purchasing electrical appliances at reasonable prices, on long-term payments and at low rates of interest.

It has been rendering a splendid service, and I hope to see such a system put into effect throughout the entire country. Since it has been in operation in Tupelo, the number of refrigerators used has almost trebled, the number of electric ranges has increased tenfold, while the use of other appliances has grown by leaps and bounds.

and bounds.

I see our time is about up, and I want to say in conclusion that I see our time is about up, and I want to say in conclusion that one of the things we are driving at is to squeeze the water out of these stocks and bring electric light and power rates down all over the country, until every human being in America is able to secure an abundant supply of electric energy at what it costs to produce and distribute it.

That is what we are doing in the Tennessee Valley area, and that is what we expect to do in every section of this country before we get through.

INCOME-TAX RETURN PUBLICITY

Mr. BELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BELL. Mr. Speaker, during the closing days of the last session of Congress the Revenue Act of 1934 was under consideration. Shortly before that time another great revenue act was passed. Both of those acts passed the House without riders requiring publicity for income-tax returns. When they came to the Senate, a rider was attached thereto, providing that the general public should have access to the income-tax returns filed by citizens of the United States.

Some 2 or 3 weeks ago I began to receive letters and telegrams from my constituents in Missouri. One of the Members of the Senate introduced a bill providing that the publicity feature in the National Recovery Act and also the publicity feature in the Revenue Act of 1934 should both be repealed. I introduced in this House a companion bill, which is H. R. 5571. Since the introduction of those bills there has been an ever-increasing volume of wires and correspondence, resolutions by chambers of commerce from all over the United States, flooding into my office.

I know that the same is true with other Members of this House. It is a very serious thing. Yesterday a lawyer from California came into my office and told me that he was here serving the interests of a great number of taxpayers, people with incomes out in his State; and he painted to me a picture of fear and consternation in the hearts of those clients who had sent him clear across the continent in order that he might present their views to the Congress of the United States.

Two or three days ago I picked up one of the great daily newspapers here in the city of Washington. On the front page of that paper was the picture of a beautiful woman. Two or three years ago her picture appeared in the paper as the recipient of a $100,000 sweepstakes prize. She was considered a very lucky girl at that time; but from that day to this gangsters and racketeers have hounded her with the results that a few days ago she had lost her reason and had been sent to an insane asylum. Now, this is just one of perhaps many similar instances that may happen unless quick action is taken to repeal these publicity provisions between now and the 15th day of March.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BELL. I yield.

Mr. HOEPPEL. I should be glad to follow the gentleman on the resolution he has proposed, provided the income of newly elected Members of Congress and Cabinet officers may be made public.

Mr. BELL. I am glad the gentleman mentioned that. Mr. HOEPPEL. We should know the incomes of the men who are making the laws of the country.

Mr. BELL. I think the gentleman is right. Another bill was introduced by a Member of this body which, in effect, repealed that certain provision of the 1926 act; but the bill of which I am speaking and which I sponsor leaves intact the features of the 1926 Revenue Act which permits committees of the House, committees of the Senate, or any Government official upon order of the President to have a copy of any income-tax return that may be filed.

Not only is there fear on the part of the people of the country on account of gangsters and racketeers, but there is also concern among business men because their competitors would have the opportunity of nosing into their secret files. This is entirely an improper and unwarranted invasion of the rights of business men to conduct their business in the way they see fit. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. ROMJUE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Missouri be allowed to continue for 5 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield? Mr. BELL. I yield.

Mr. O'CONNOR. The gentleman is discussing a problem with which this House has struggled for a great many years; and there is quite a body of sentiment in this House on the side of the gentleman from Missouri, but I would advise him that he use his efforts at the other end of the Capitol. There is the place to have this measure passed first if the law is to be repealed. Some of us in the House have been trying for a long time to devise means so that the other body might first handle "the buck" rather than this House having to pass legislation in the first instance only to have it emasculated in the other body. If the gentleman will have the other body repeal these provisions, I am sure he will find support in the House to do away with this measure, which has caused so much comment throughout the Nation.

Mr. BELL. If the gentleman will pardon me, I would remind him that I do not have the privilege of speaking on the floor of the other body.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield? Mr. BELL. I yield.

Mr. DONDERO. Can the gentleman point out what good this provision has been to the United States Government?

Mr. BELL. I cannot. I do not think it has been of any good to the United States Government.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BELL. I yield.

Mr. PATMAN. Does the gentleman know why that provision was inserted in the law last year?

Mr. BELL. I think I do.

Mr. PATMAN. Does not the gentleman know that the Government was 3 years late finding out that it was being defrauded of hundreds of millions of dollars, and that that was the reason some sort of publicity was necessary, or that some means should be devised that would permit certain people to find out certain things in order that those who had been defrauding the Government might be discovered, and in order that such schemes in the future might be prevented, or at least detected as soon as commenced?

Mr. BELL. I am glad the gentleman brought that up. I should like to answer the gentleman's question or statement in this way: Several years ago a provision similar to the one now under discussion was passed by Congress. It stayed in effect. I think, only 1 year and then was repealed, because it was found to be absolutely worthless. This provision is exceedingly objectionable to the people.

The former provision was found to be unworkable. There is a sane and sensible provision in the law which was passed in 1926 by which Government officials have the right to look into and have ready access to the income-tax return of any citizen. It is not going to have any beneficial effect for some snooper who has no official duty to perform to have the information which would be furnished by the publication contemplated.

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield? Mr. BELL. I yield.

Mr. YOUNG. Does the gentleman believe that had there been publicity of income-tax returns, J. P. Morgan would for 3 years have escaped paying any income tax whatever to his Government?

Mr. BELL. I am not, of course, familiar with the private affairs of J. P. Morgan, but I do know that during those 3 years committees of the House and committees of the Senate, as well as officials of the Treasury Department, the Governor of any State, or any other proper official of the Government, had access to those income-tax returns. If there was anything wrong with them, the proper officials of the Government had the opportunity and the duty of rectifying the trouble, and it would not have helped at all for some snooper from Podunk to have gone there and looked over Mr. Morgan's income-tax returns.

Mr. TRUAX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BELL. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. TRUAX. I presume Morgan, Mellon, and all the other millionaires of this country are in favor of the repeal to it, and I feel its retention is the only method by which we may arrive at the amount of money these multimillionaires ought to pay the Government, and which they are defrauding the Government of at this time.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I hope the gentleman will answer a question for me in reference to this proposition. I am opposed to the outright repeal of this provision, and I expect to oppose the measure if it comes up. I am not in favor, however, of the list being given out to newspapers. I am also opposed to the list being posted on the boards of post offices as well as being given to newspapers, but I believe that any citizen has a right to get the information from the Bureau of Internal Revenue and the Secretary of the Treasury, and that those officials, in answer to a bona fide inquiry, should furnish the infor-

Mr. BULWINKLE. How is the gentleman going to judge the bona fideness of the inquiry?

Mr. PATMAN. That will be up to the Secretary of the Treasury to make regulations.

Mr. BELL. I would like to answer the gentleman's in-

Mr. PATMAN. Would the gentleman be willing to permit the law to be changed so that in answer to a bona fide inquiry, to be passed upon by the Secretary of the Treasury, the information may be made available? Would the gentleman be willing to agree to that change?

Mr. BELL. The law of 1926 provides that the President of the United States under regulations promulgated by the Treasury Department may do just that thing.

Mr. PATMAN. The people cannot afford to burden the President with each case.

Mr. BELL. I will tell the gentleman the weakness of his position, if he will permit me. If we have a provision that any respectible citizen upon demand may get the returns of any other citizen-

Mr. PATMAN. Not the returns.

Mr. BELL. Or any information contained in the returns. Mr. PATMAN. No; that is not a part of this law. The law permits only the gross amount of income, the deductions and the net income and tax paid to be made public.

Mr. BELL. That is very true.

Mr. PATMAN. That does not mean disclosing the private or secret affairs of any company or business.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I ask the gentleman what the law is today?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

Mr. KELLER. I reserve the right to object.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded. The regular order is, Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 minutes on a subject of importance to California and the Nation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Speaker, I object.

ANNIVERSARY ADDRESS

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a certain speech which I have heretofore made.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include a radio address delivered by inscribed with dates and names of individuals connected with of this income-tax publicity feature; however, I am opposed | myself from the top of the Washington Monument on February 22, 1935.

On this, the two hundred and third anniversary of the birth of George Washington, it is my privilege, through the courtesy of the Columbia Broadcasting Co., to speak to you from the top of the Washington Monument, in the Nation's Capital, 500 feet above the city which bears his name.

Amid a magnificent setting stands this great monumental tribute to the "Father of his Country"—a simple, sublime obelisk of white marble. Far below spread the verdant expanses of Potomac Park, bordered by the historic Potomac River, which some 12 miles to the south runs directly past Mount Vernon, the home of George Washington. Nearby I can see the majestic Lincoln Memorial, the White House—home of President Roosevelt coln Memorial, the White House—home of President Roosevelt—and the many stately buildings housing the various departments of the Government. And in the distance, across the river, are the rolling hills of Virginia, so loved by George Washington. Crowning the view is the great white dome of the United States Capitol, the cornerstone of which was laid by George Washington himself. And far into the distance the beautiful city of Washington intrigues the eye with its wide avenues and numerous parks.

But let me tell you something of the interesting history of the monument itself—this symbol of American strength and simplicity. When the capstone of the Washington Monument was set on December 6, 1884, this great memorial to the first President of the United States, whose birthday we celebrate today, was completed after nearly 37 years had elapsed since Congress authorized the Washington National Monument Society to proceed with

Even during Washington's lifetime, and as early as August 7, Even during Washington's lifetime, and as early as August 7, 1783, the Continental Congress passed resolutions providing for an equestrian statue of General Washington, which was to be erected in the future Federal City. And the act establishing the site for the Federal City was not passed until July 16, 1790. The War of Independence was ended and the country was universally grateful to the noble leader to whose efforts they justly ascribed a great measure of its success. According to the L'Enfant plan for the Federal City, which was made in 1791, a tract of land was set apart between the site of the President's mansion and the Potomac River as the spot where the national monument to the American Revolution was to be erected. But after Washington's death it Revolution was to be erected. But after Washington's death it was agreed upon to use this as the site for the Monument to was agreed upon to use this as the site for the Monument to Washington himself.

The Washington Monument Society was organized in 1833 by a body of influential citizens of the city of Washington, and Chief Justice John Marshall was the first president of the society.

In 1836 American artists were invited to submit designs for a monument to cost approximately $1,000,000. The competition was won by Robert Mills, a well-known architect of the time, but his pantheon feature at the base was never adopted.

A national campaign was inaugurated to obtain contributions. Very little progress was made in the collection of funds, and in 1847 the collections totaled only $87,000. With this amount, however, it was determined to initiate the work. On January 31, 1848, Congress passed a resolution authorizing the Washington Monument Society to erect the monument, and the cornerstone was laid with fitting ceremonies on July 4, 1848. How appropriate it was that the cornerstone of this lofty structure, which means so much to patriotic Americans, should have been laid on the birthday of our national independence.

Between 1848 and 1854 the Monument Society expended $250,000 on the construction and a height of 174 feet was attained. Work had progressed slowly until 1854, when a block of marble which had originally stood in the Temple of Concord at Rome, sent by the Pope to be set in the wall of the Monument, was stolen and no trace of it was ever found. The stealing of this stone was an example of the religious prejudice against which George Washington fought so strongly. However, the disappearance of this stone discouraged the collection of public contributions, so that the construction work ceased entirely.

In 1873 Congress became interested in the lack of progress in the construction and on August 22, 1876, passed an act creating a joint commission for the completion of the Monument and made the necessary appropriation. Before resuming work on the shaft it was deemed best to strengthen the foundations by placing under it additional concrete supports. After this, work was resumed on the Monument itself in 1880, the construction was fully completed 4 years later, and the Monument dedicated on February 21, 1835. However, it was not opened to the public until 3½ years later. The dedication exercises were conducted by a joint commission of Congress, with ceremonies at the base of the Monument, followed by appropriate proceedings in the Hall of the House of Representatives.

One hundred and eighty-seven memorial stones are set in the inner face of the Monument, including stones from 40 States, 15 Masonic lodges, and various other organizations of this and other countries. These stones are inscribed with stirring tributes from many lands to the greatness of the man whom the world has delighted to honor. An interesting feature of the Monument is the fact that the capstone is crowned by a small aluminum tip, 9 inches high and 4½ inches in diameter at its base, weighing 100 ounces. At that time, 1884, this was the largest piece of aluminum that had ever been cast in the world. The faces of aluminum point were the erection. Within recent months the exterior of the Monument |

The finished monument is 555 feet 5½ inches high. The cost of the foundations and shaft was $1,187,710, of which the Society raised by free-will offerings the sum of $300,000, and the Government contributed.

Since completion it is estimated that more than 10,000,000 people have traveled up its 878 steps or have taken the elevator to the top landing.

George Washington selected the site for the "Federal City", George Washington selected the site for the "Federal City", as he always referred to it, and to his knowledge and wisdom, supplemented by the advice of those whom he selected to assist him, we owe it that the Federal City was so planned and started as to become one of the most magnificent capitals of the world. The original commissioners appointed for the administration of the city, named it "Washington" in honor of its founder.

And now, on this birthday anniversary, let us glance for a moment at the career of George Washington, which so many historians have vied with each other in describing, and of which no American ever wearles.

Every step of that career every episode of that glorious life.

torians have vied with each other in describing, and of which no American ever wearies.

Every step of that career, every episode of that glorious life, from the time of his birth 203 years ago in that primitive farmhouse in Westmoreland County, Va., to his death at Mount Vernon 67 years later, has been described by the most brilliant historians of our land. His youth under the loving care of that venerated mother, who fortunately lived not only to see him restored safely to her after the perils of the Revolutionary War but to see him in her eighty-second year elected to be the first President of the country he so gallantly led in conflict, his romantic adventures as a surveyor, his escape from Indian arrows and his miraculous survival at the defeat of Braddock; then taking his seat in the Virginia House of Burgesses; and later his election to the Continental Congress at Philadelphia, where on June 15, 1775, he was unanimously appointed General and Commander in Chief of the forces raised for the preservation of American liberty. His heroic courage and untiring devotion with which he planned and pursued that long contest from the successful slege of Boston, through all his successes and reverses, and the sufferings of Germantown, Brandywine, Monmouth, and Valley Forge, so vividly in our memory, to the slege of Yorktown in 1781, where by sheer strategy and with aid of our gallant allies, he finally claimed that crowning victory on the soil of his beloved Virginia.

And to his home in Virginia he returned on Christmas Eve of 1783, after surrendering his commission as Commander in Chief—returned to seek the peace and domestic happiness he loved so well but from which duty carried him so many times.

1783, after surrendering his commission as Commander in Chief-returned to seek the peace and domestic happiness he loved so well but from which duty carried him so many times.

There at Mount Vernon he died on December 14, 1799, but his memory lives on in all its splendor.

The Washington Monument as it now stands, in all its simplicity and beauty, is curiously like the man himself. The history of its building is a struggle against difficulties, and its final completion in this simple form, despite the many efforts to clutter up the design with useless decorations, is like the final triumph of George Washington himself in war and in peace.

Generation after genera-tion honors his name, his deeds, and the sound principles for which he stood And we today bow our heads in reverent memory to the "Father of our Country", George Washington, the first President of the United States, whose name and fame will live on as long as patriotism and justice are cherished among men.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Speaker, I understand the gentleman from Maryland will withdraw his objection to my previous request. I therefore ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Speaker and Members, I am going to read from a newspaper clipping of yesterday, in which it is stated that the tariff on manganese ore from Brazil has been reduced from 1 cent to one-half cent per pound. I also notice in the same news clipping that the manganese mines in Brazil, which will profit from this tariff reduction, are entirely owned by the United States Steel Corporation.

I also read another newspaper item in connection with this Brazilian treaty, wherein it is stated that Brazil now faithfully promises that as quickly as business conditions permit she will start the payment of interest on Brazilian bonds held by American investors here. In other words, the United States Steel Corporation, which profits through the reduction in tariff on manganese ore, will sell steel to us in this country without any reduction in price. A reduction in the tariff will virtually give the Brazilian Government a monopoly on importations of manganese to this country, and as a result, it is anticipated that the Brazilian Government will be in a position to repay the private loans owed the international bankers, who also indirectly own or control the United States Steel Corporation.

It is safe to assume that the most of these bonds are in the hands of J. Pierpont Morgan and his group and it should be remembered that the bulk of these bonds were doubtless obtained from private American bondholders at a substantial reduction in their face value.

Mr. Speaker, the Steel Trust, through this reciprocal agreement, will benefit first, in obtaining an important raw material at $10 less per ton, and second, in selling its steel to us here in the United States without a reduction in price. The members of the Steel Trust who hold Brazilian bonds will now have their bonds repaid-bonds which, it should be remembered, were obtained at far below their face value. Of what concern is it to the Steel Trust if the employees now engaged in mining manganese are placed on the list of the unemployed, as I understand probably from 5,000 to 7.000 will be?

A reduction in tariff rates on manganese ore did not include importations from Russia. The reason is obvious. If Russian ores were admitted to compete on an equal basis with Brazilian ore in the American markets, the Brazilian Government would not be in a position to repay the international bondholders in Wall Street so expeditiously. As Russia has refused to pay pre-war and Kerensky debts, the international bondholders would gain no advantage if the rates on Russian manganese were reduced. It should be borne in mind that the millions of dollars owed by Russia in this country resulted from purchases of war munitions, with the Morgan firm acting as the fiscal agent. The report is that the Russians were furnished munitions at 100 percent profit to the Morgan firm, and that, in addition, 15 percent of the loan was absorbed by the banking house of Morgan for handling the transaction.

The Russians cannot be blamed, in my opinion, for repudiating a debt of this kind to munition makers and the house of Morgan. Perhaps Russia would have been granted equal consideration with Brazil if the Russian Government had subscribed to paying the debt owed by Russia to the international bankers in Wall Street.

PROTECTION FOR CALIFORNIA AGRICULTURAL INDUSTRIES

In order to protect the industries of California and the Nation, I am presenting today a resolution providing-

That it is the sense of the House of Representatives that the fullest measure of consideration should be given to all factors involved in reciprocal tariff negotiations and that the tariff rates should not be reduced on any products of the agricultural industry of California or elsewhere in the United States where such reduction would result in lowering of the price level below the cost of production, plus handling and transportation charges to point of competition, plus a return of 6 percent on the investment of the specific industries involved. of the specific industries involved.

Mr. Speaker, I voted for the Reciprocal Tariff Act, but only after I was assured that the interests of our American producers would be fully protected in any trade agreements. Under date of June 15, 1934, the President himself, in a letter to the gentleman from California [Mr. Buck], assured him that agreements under the Reciprocal Tariff Act would in no wise be inimical to the interests of California agriculture.

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield? The gentleman brought my name into this, and I think he should

Mr. HOEPPEL. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BUCK. Does the gentleman mean to state that he voted for the passage of this act in April because the President wrote me a letter in June?

Mr. HOEPPEL. No.

Mr. BUCK. The gentleman made that statement.

Mr. HOEPPEL. That was one of the things that influenced me in believing that my vote for the reciprocal tariff was justified. We discussed this question before and, because I believed that California agricultural industries would be protected under the reciprocal agreements, I voted for the Mr. BUCK. Did the gentleman ever discuss that question with me?

Mr. HOEPPEL. No: but with other colleagues.

Mr. BUCK. Does the gentleman consider that manganese ore is an agricultural product?

Mr. HOEPPEL. My resolution refers to agricultural products. I have presented the manganese situation in some detail as an illustration of how the reciprocal tariff agreements may be made and as justification for the widespread apprehension of our agriculturists in reference to contemplated reciprocal tariff agreements involving their products. We have another pertinent illustration of the dire effects of cut-throat foreign competition in the quicksilver industry, which virtually faces destruction, due to the continued dumping of quicksilver in our markets from Spain. The potential increased competition of the products of cheap land and cheap labor of foreign countries in our home markets is a direct menace to our agricultural industry and, in view of the uncertainties of the present situation, just cause for its fears and protests.

I have in my hand a communication showing that the 1934 price to the almond growers in California has already been reduced, due to the fact that we are negotiating with Italy on the question of tariffs on almonds and kindred agricultural products. Official records prove that Italy's imports to the United States have been reduced one-half during the past 2 years. Our own production of almonds has been reduced 25 percent. If we now lower the duty on almonds, more Italian almonds will doubtless be imported, and fewer American almonds will be produced. In my opinion, instead of handicapping, we should encourage home production through adequate tariff protection. The duty should be increased so that our growers may increase their production and, if possible, supply the entire American market. If we lower the tariff rates on Italy's agricultural products and thus place them in favored competition with California agricultural products, it is possible that the Italian Government will receive sufficient revenue so that they may be in a position to pay Pierpont Morgan and other international bondholders some of the obligations which they now owe, but I am unalterably opposed to such considerations entering into reciprocal trade negotiations.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOEPPEL. I yield.

Mr. RICH. Does not the gentleman believe we made a mistake when we gave the President the power to make these reciprocal trade agreements and that we should change that law?

Mr. HOEPPEL. If it appears that the agreements are to be based upon payment of the obligations owed to us by other nations, which obligations are held in large part by Pierpont Morgan, then we made a mistake.

Mr. RICH. If we allow these things to come in and interfere with American trade and with the Americans who are producing these things here, why does it make any difference whether the money is paid to Morgan or the steel company or anybody else?

Mr. HOEPPEL. The gentleman's general thought is in accordance with my views; but I particularly resent the sacrifice of our American industries to build up increasing wealth in the hands of a few.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOEPPEL. I yield.

Mr. MOTT. Did I understand the gentleman to say that he voted for these reciprocal trade agreements because he believed that the agricultural products of California were going to be exempted?

Mr. HOEPPEL. It was my belief that the agricultural products of California would be adequately protected, and that rates, under no condition, would be reduced for our walnuts, almonds, citrus, and other basic products which we can produce in sufficient quantity to supply the American market.

Mr. MOTT. And now the gentleman wants to pass a law which will specifically exempt the products of California.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may have 2 more minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOEPPEL. I would like to refer to another situation. Mr. MOTT. The gentleman did not answer my question. Mr. HOEPPEL. What is the gentleman's question?

Mr. MOTT. The gentleman stated he voted for this law because he thought California products were going to be exempt and now he asks in his bill, as I understand it, for legislative exemption of California products.

Mr. HOEPPEL. If the gentleman will refer to my resolution, he will see that I have asked for adequate protection for our agricultural industry, not only in California but throughout the United States, against foreign competition which would reduce the domestic price level below the cost of production, plus handling and transportation costs, plus a reasonable return on the investment.

Mr. MOTT. Why does not the gentleman ask for the repeal of the law in its entirety? [Applause.]

Mr. HOEPPEL. Unless we give more consideration in reciprocal trade agreements to the agricultural and business interests of this country than we do to the international bankers, the law ought to be repealed.

I would like to make this further statement: We know that Pierpont Morgan and the banking interests of New York purchased Mexican bonds at a surprisingly low figure. Appeals to me from the agricultural interests in southern California state that reciprocal trade agreements are in contemplation which would permit the entry of Mexican agricultural products in competition with the vegetable industry of southern California. If such agreements are consummated, the Mexican Government then perhaps will be in a position to pay some of the international bondholders, even though in this process the agricultural industry of southern California suffers irreparable injury and our growers are placed on the relief rolls in increasing numbers.

Mr. STUBBS. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit, I would like to say that in my opinion my colleague from California [Mr. Hoeppel] is rendering the agricultural interests of California splendid service by the presentation of this resolution. Representing, as I do, a large agricultural district, I am sure they are pleading for the very protection which the gentleman's resolution will insure.

Mr. HOEPPEL. I thank the gentleman for his observation and kind remarks. Unless we protect the farmers of California, as well as the farmers everywhere throughout the United States, we will have increasing millions on the relief rolls, while the principal beneficiaries of these reciprocal trade agreements, if they follow the course which has already been established, will be the banking houses of Morgan and others.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, cannot the gentleman reduce his request to 5 minutes?

Mr. BUCK. I simply asked for 10 minutes, because my colleague got an extension of time, but I shall try to get through in 5 minutes.

Mr. SHORT. The gentleman's colleague had only 7

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman from California proceeding for 5 minutes?

There was no objection.

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Speaker, I hesitate to disagree with my learned colleague from California on any subject, but I do feel I have some claim to speak for California agriculture, not only as its Representative on the Committee on Agriculture last year, but as one who is an actual producer of the products the gentleman is so solicitous for in his statement today.

This same propaganda, this same insidious attempt to undermine the constructive efforts that the Departments of State and Agriculture are now making on behalf of the agricultural interests of the whole Nation, started last April immediately after the passage of the Reciprocal Trade Agreement Act.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield? Mr. BUCK. No; not for the moment.

It is continuing now. These people are going to the farmers throughout California trying to make them believe that they are being harmed by these reciprocal trade agreements when the facts are to the contrary. They are making such ridiculous and absurd statements as that just made by my colleague—that Mexico is planning to do something to injure California products.

The actual facts are that no trade conversations have been held with Mexico. The present status of the tariff-bargaining program may be briefly summarized as follows:

First. Agreement with Cuba concluded; results gratifying insofar as may be measured.

Second. Agreement signed February 2, 1935, with Brazil. This agreement requires the approval of the Brazilian Congress and exchange of instruments of ratification between the two countries before coming into force.

Third. Hearings held on proposed agreements with 13 other countries: Haiti, Belgium, Colombia, Costa Rica, Guatemala, Honduras, Nicaragua, El Salvador, Sweden, Spain, Switzerland, the Netherlands, and Finland. Negotiations in progress or practically finished.

Fourth. Hearings scheduled for proposed agreements with two other countries: Canada and Italy. Preliminary negotiations begun.

Fifth. The Colombian agreement practically completed. Awaits action by the Colombian Parliament.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCK. Yes.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Every agricultural bureau and foreign bureaus are frank in saying that they are combining their efforts—

Mr. BUCK. I know of no such statements from any bureau.

Under the only reciprocal trade agreement as yet effective, that with Cuba, with the lowering of the Cuban duties on American exports, we have increased the export of our canned goods to Cuba from an average for 1932 and 1933 for the 5 months September to December, inclusive, comparable with the same 5 months in 1934, when the reduced rates were in effect, from 178,281 pounds to 852,847 pounds. Not all of these exports were from California, but it is a well-known fact that the bulk of our canned-fruit exports come from that State, as do the bulk of the other exports I shall now mention.

In the same 5-month period we increased the export of raisins to Cuba from 83,356 pounds to 165,060 pounds and of dried prunes from 119,260 pounds to 220,941 pounds. We have increased our exports of canned fruit for salads—almost exclusively a California product—from 10,032 pounds to 68,048 pounds. We have increased—and this will interest the gentlemen from California—exports to Cuba in the same comparable periods of canned sardines from 93,578 pounds to 642,314 pounds.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Were those sardines canned by the Japanese?

Mr. BUCK. If your citizens are Japanese, they were. [Laughter.] Similarly we have increased the exports on canned peas to Cuba from 101,058 pounds to 276,982 pounds, of grapes in a fresh state from 987,177 pounds to 1,455,793 pounds. That has certainly helped out our distressed vine-yardists, and the Members of this House know my continuing and serious interest in every form of viticulture.

I could continue on at some length and cite similar instances, but I will include only one more, and that only lest the House think only agriculture has benefited. Let me say, however, that I do not confuse this item with the products of the field. The importation of motion-picture sound equipment, including records, certainly of interest to California and particularly our fair Southland, increased in value in the same months from an average for 1932–33 of $7,810 to $16,061 for 1934.

The proof of the pudding is in the eating thereof. I submit that these few facts, not fancies, sufficiently indicate the only agreement in operation, that with Cuba, is doing what it was hoped and expected it would do, increase our foreign trade. The agricultural production of California has been largely built on an export basis. It does not merely include the items I have mentioned. The value of oranges exported in 1929 from California alone was $17,244,000; it had dropped in 1932 to $6,317,000. Exported barley dropped in value from $9,317,000 to $6,576,000; canned asparagus from $3,439,000 to $1,332,000.

The total value of foreign exports from California in 1929 was $380,344,000; in 1932 it was $149,201,000, a decrease of 60.8 percent. The 1929 amount was greater by $48,000,000 than the entire budget for the State of California for that period, greater than the entire cash income from California crops for 1932 by $5,000,000, and over $110,000,000 greater than the entire wage bill for California manufacture in 1931.

Is not such a trade worth restoration? Unless steps forward continue to be taken to bring about this result, all of the products formerly finding their way into foreign trade and now beginning to do so again must be thrown back into home consumption, causing havor there, as has been the case for 4 years past, or they must be sacrificed and wasted with consequent staggering losses to our agricultural industry.

In 1932 approximately 1,100,000 acres of land in California were devoted to the production of fruit. An average of 50 percent of this fruit formerly moved into foreign trade, either in fresh, canned, or dried form or in the form of alcoholic beverages. The cut of 60.8 percent referred to was chiefly attributable to tariff increases and quota restrictions. In this connection it is interesting to note that while the California export trade generally declined in the first 10 months of 1931 by 30.8 percent over 1930, it dropped 57.7 percent with Australia, 42 percent with New Zealand, 52.8 percent with Mexico, 78.8 percent with Argentina, the countries making major tariff revisions at that time.

And so the story has gone and will continue to go unless these reciprocal trade agreements are put into effect. They are for the benefit, not the destruction, of our producers, and will tend at once to remedy the dislocation of the basic California industries which has taken place there. And this same statement applies as well to all other parts of the country. I beg the Members of the House not to be led astray by these attempts to sabotage the constructive work of restoration now proceeding.

The gentleman refers to a letter written me by the President of the United States. The full text of the letter appears on page 12180 of the Congressional Record of June 16, 1934. The President was conscious of the effort that was already being made to undermine the work contemplated. His letter was sent me to reassure farmers and fruit growers everywhere and not merely California growers. In view of what has so far developed, no one can possibly impute to this letter any effort to deceive.

Finally let me say that the success of these agreements is vital to the full restoration of all agriculture, not merely those branches I have mentioned. If it is interfered with, the responsibility is not upon those of us trying to do this tremendous work of restoring foreign trade, but upon those who are trying to interfere with that restoration. Upon them must rest this responsibility. As far as I am concerned, as far as the agricultural organizations that I know are concerned, we are looking forward to even greater benefits than have already been received by these reciprocal agreements as they are made.

I have not time to go into the Brazilian agreement with you, though agriculturally speaking, it will be equally as advantageous to us as the Cuban.

Mr. Speaker, I hope at a later date that I may be able to get some time to discuss this entire situation fully. But today I think I have pointed out some of the faults in my colleague's resolution offered this morning. [Applause.]

J. J. CLELAND

Mr. FADDIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 2 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. FADDIS. Mr. Speaker, I notice in the Record of February 20, 1935, page 2297, that my colleague, Mr. Berlin, from Pennsylvania, in his extension of remarks has made a most unwarranted and ungentlemanly attack upon a friend and constituent of mine, one J. J. Cleland, who is the agricultural census supervisor of the Fourth Pennsylvania District; a man of utmost honor and integrity and a man for whom I have the very highest regard. In his remarks he refers to Mr. Cleland as an example of the high-handed, imperious, arrogant, and insulting bureaucrat and vermin. Now, as the Members of the House well know, I would be the last man in this House to fly to the defense of these almost unbearable bureaucrats who are every day growing more contemptuous of Congressmen, but this is plainly a case of mistaken identity on the part of my colleague, Mr. BERLIN. Upon an investigation of this matter I am authorized to make this statement: That neither Mr. Cleland nor John Dickinson, Assistant Secretary of Commerce, were to blame in this matter, but that the recommendation of the names in question came from the State organization of Pennsylvania. I regret exceedingly that the patronage feud of my colleague has brought into it the names of parties who are in no way responsible, and I feel sure that when he reflects on the matter, that he will feel that he owes these gentlemen an apology. I wish to repeat, however, that this must not be considered in any way a defense of the growing Frankenstein of bureaucracy which we have set up in this Nation and which, if not soon throttled, will devour representative government.

THE I. L. O. AND THE WORKER

Mr. COLDEN. Mr. Speaker, I renew my request to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include certain excerpts to which I heretofore referred.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, since my previous objection I have had an opportunity to examine the remarks of the gentleman from California [Mr. Colden], and I find that those are very short excerpts and are really necessary to the gentleman's own remarks. Therefore I withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. COLDEN. Mr. Speaker, concerning the discussion on February 7, 1935, of the proposed appropriation of $174,630 for the purpose of enabling the United States to send and maintain delegates to the International Labor Organization at Geneva, Switzerland, I desire to extend my remarks with additional comments. On that occasion I directed some questions to the gentlemen from Massachusetts [Mr. Tink-HAM and Mr. Connery], who were leading the attack on the appropriation and also as to the purposes and motives of the International Labor Organization, alphabetically abbreviated as I. L. O.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Tinkham] made the charge, "This appropriation means the United States entry into the League of Nations." Mr. Connery drew a similar inference. It cannot be disputed that the I. L. O. was created by part XIII of the Treaty of Versailles. However, both the gentlemen from Massachusetts, upon careful consideration, must be aware that there is nothing in part XIII that in any way embroils our country or any other in the political and territorial ambitions and intrigue of any country in Europe or any other part of the world.

Permit me to call the attention of the eminent gentlemen from Massachusetts to a paragraph of the resolution of invitation extended to the United States upon the announcement at the I. L. O. Conference in Geneva that a joint resolution of Congress in June 1934 authorized the President to accept membership. Note the reference to the League of Nations. I quote:

* Hereby decides to invite the Government of the United States to accept membership in the International Labor Organization, it being understood that such acceptance involves only those rights and obligations provided for in the constitution of the organization and shall not involve any obligations under the Covenant of the League of Nations.

This resolution was adopted by a unanimous vote. I will not undertake to reply to the aspersions as to the passage of the bill in the Seventy-third Congress because others have completely covered this point.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Tinkham] did attempt to becloud the issue by arousing the current prejudices against the Communists of Russia, the Fascists of Italy, and the Nazis of Germany. The gentleman from Massa-chusetts [Mr. Tinkham] asks, "American representatives will be formulating labor legislation for the United States in cooperation with whom?" Then he answers his own question by saying, "With Communists, Fascists, and National Socialists." The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Tinkham] evidently overlooks the fact that there are approximately 58 nations of the world participating in the I. L. O., and all of these nations have equal representation with the nations to which he points with alarm. Furthermore, at this time Germany is not a member. Even if we should go so far as to refuse to cooperate with three nations with which we disagree in their policies of internal politics, it does not offer a sufficient reason why we as a people should refuse to cooperate with approximately 55 other nations, a majority of whom, at least, are friendly neighbors.

Our colleague from Massachusetts [Mr. Tinkham] admits that in the Seventy-third Congress he voted for an appropriation to send representation to the Agricultural Institute at Rome, but in answer to a question, my colleague stated, "I did not consider that a political relationship but a wholly economic one. Of course, I have no objection to economic connections with any nation." The gentleman conceded by his vote that the Agricultural Institute at Rome is of value to the farmers of the world. I desire to point out that the I. L. O. is attempting to do for the worker what the Agricultural Institute is doing for the farmer. Any fair observer will admit that the condition of the sweat-shop worker, the abuse of children and women workers, the overworked and underpaid workers of many industries is infinitely worse than that of the farmer. By his admission of his support of the Agricultural Institute, I submit that the eminent gentleman from Massachusetts has contradicted himself upon his own position.

As to the purpose of the I. L. O., I desire to present the preamble of part XIII of the Treaty of Versailles for consideration. I know of no method of getting at the purpose of the I. L. O. better than by quoting the preamble which sets forth the purpose of the organization, as follows:

PART XIII (LABOR) OF THE TREATY OF VERSAILLES OF JUNE 28, 1919 SECTION 1. ORGANIZATION OF LABOR

Whereas the League of Nations has for its object the establishment of universal peace, and such a peace can be established only if it is based upon social justice; Whereas conditions of labor exist involving such injustice, hardship, and privation to large numbers of people as to produce unrest so great that the peace and harmony of the world are imperiled; so great that the peace and harmony of the world are imperiled; and an improvement of those conditions is urgently required, as, for example, by the regulation of the hours of work, including the establishment of a maximum working day and week, the regulation of the labor supply, the prevention of unemployment, the provision of an adequate living wage, the protection of the worker against sickness, disease, and injury arising out of his employment, the protection of children, young persons, and women; provision for old age and injury; protection of the interests of workers when employed in countries other than their own; recognition of vocational and technical education, and other measures: tional and technical education, and other measures

Whereas also the failure of any nation to adopt humane conditions of labor is an obstacle in the way of other nations which desire to improve the conditions in their own countries;

The high contracting parties, moved by sentiments of justice and humanity as well as by the desire to secure the permanent peace of the world, agree to the following:

And so forth.

My colleagues will note that this preamble points out that | one of the causes of unrest in all the nations of the world is social injustice and that hardship and privation of large numbers of people imperil the peace of the world, and that an improvement of such conditions is urgently required. I would like to ask any gentleman upon the floor of this House if it is not a self-evident truth that if the nations of the world by any means at their disposal seek to establish friendship and peace, is it not necessary for all of those nations to establish an order of social justice and economic fairness that will give content to their own people within the borders of their own domain? Who is there on this floor that can question the justness and the necessity of the regulation of hours and adequate living wage, prevention of unemployment, protection of the worker against sickness, disease, unemployment, child labor, old age, and injury and the other evils from which the workers suffer in every part of the world?

Who is there that can successfully challenge that part of the preamble which states: "Whereas also the failure of any nation to adopt humane conditions of labor is an obstacle in the way of other nations." The commercial and industrial structure of this country and of many others is at this moment deeply concerned with the competition from the underpaid workers, the enforced long hours of Japan. These same workers in Japan while throwing competing workers out of employment in all parts of the world are undoubtedly laboring under conditions which are to themselves revolting. Undoubtedly, some day these workers will seek to correct their own conditions and throw off the servitude of the present day. The I. L. O. is an agency that affords these helpless workers of Japan a ray of hope for shorter hours and better conditions of living.

The I. L. O. is making its survey among the different nations of the world for the purpose of improving the condition of the worker by a higher standard of living, by its outstanding contribution to the establishment of an 8-hour day, to the improvement of sanitation and health, safety devices, compensation, the partial elimination of child labor, better protection for women. All these reforms set up a standard to encourage the worker everywhere.

It is true, and I am proud of the fact, that in some industries in our own country our standards are higher than those advocated or announced by the I. L. O. We must remember that we are the richest nation on the face of the globe, and because of that fact we are entitled to a higher standard of living for every citizen. Our best standards of living are a beacon light to those workers in less fortunate nations where the levels of living are miserably low. It is also true that notwithstanding our natural riches and some of our high standards, that we have a very large population in our own country who are overworked, who are underpaid, who suffer from living and working conditions that are insanitary, and where the health of the fathers and mothers, through overwork and undernourishment, is so impaired that their adversities and afflictions will be so implanted in their posterity that it may take generations to eliminate.

Permit me to remind my colleague that one of the outstanding friends of labor, Samuel Gompers, who devoted his life to the cause of labor, was the Chairman of the International Conference at Versailles for legislation for labor and that he was supported in his program by the ever vigilant and sympathetic and idealistic President of the United States, Woodrow Wilson. Mr. Gompers, himself, stated that the American delegation to the peace conference wrote the heart and soul of its constitution. Mr. Gompers further stated in reply to critics, that he defended the instrument not because it was perfect but because it constituted the fairest statement of labor principles that had ever been incorporated in an international treaty. President Wilson called it a most admirable document and second in importance only to the League of Nations itself. And Mr. Wood, of Missouri, informed us that present prominent labor leaders approve the

My own reaction when I visited the I. L. O. headquarters in Geneva, some years ago, was surprise and commendation in finding what an important work the I. L. O. was performing. All things considered, the I. L. O. has received encouraging support from the nations of the world. At the time of my visit its headquarters occupied a building separate and apart from the League of Nations. It was a busy spot, not unlike one of the office buildings in the leading cities of my own country.

I was happily surprised to find in my interviews and in the reports and pamphlets of the I. L. O., evidence that even at that early date it was achieving notable results. Above all, that it was an organization that reached, with few exceptions, the nations of the world, and everywhere this noble effort was building up the program of labor, upholding the worker and inspiring him to look for a better part in this world to which he has contributed so much and received so little. That the efforts of the I. L. O. even in its early days had a happy response not only in Europe but in far-off Persia, where no trades union stood ready to defend the distressed, is shown in the story of Persian children and Kerman carpets related by Prof. P. J. Noel Baker, of the University of London and of Ruskin College, Oxford, in his volume the League of Nations at Work:

To begin with, there is no ventilation. It would make the room too cold; and why should the employer be put to the expense of fires? Sanitary arrangements are nonexistent. The factory is only lighted by the small skylight; if the children could look out of the windows their attention would wander, say the employers. No wonder! when most of them are at an age when in England they would be attending a kindergarten and not be expected to concentrate on one task for more than 15 minutes at a time! The song that they sing is the pattern of the carpet: "One green, three reds, two blues, five grays", and so on, the rule of the threads. It is the only way in which these mites can remember it. How do they work? The big loom is stretched vertically on a frame; the children are seated on a narrow board, starting close to the ground, and moved upward as the work goes on, till the tiny workers are many times their own height from the floor. They retain their precarious seat by doubling their little legs back under the narrow board; there is no rest for aching little backs. And here they sit—for how long? I cannot tell you what are the longest hours they ever work. But I know of the European doctor who managed to persuade the Governor of Kerman to issue a decree limiting the hours of work of these children (some not yet 5 years old) to "from sunrise to sunset" i. e., an average of 12 hours a day! When that particular governor died conditions relapsed into their former state until the I. L. O. interfered. The children do not even get down for meals.

At last, at the end of the day, the signal is given to cease work. You expect the children, when the beam is lowered, to jump off and run away home, glad to be free. A few can do so. Most have much difficulty in unbending their cramped limbs at all. Some sit there huddled up and helpless, till a father or a brother arrives, to carry them home. Crippled already, and what wonder?

After an investigation, the I. L. O. made remedial recommendations and the Persian Government dealt with these miserable conditions. The present status of these children leaves much to be hoped for and remains far below a decent standard. This shameful story gives one a pain instead of a pleasure when considering the drudgery and misery of little children in weaving a Persian rug.

It has been noted that the labor delegates at the sessions of the general conferences of the I. L. O. have been almost uniformly recommended by the labor organizations in their respective countries. Without official authorization some of the outstanding labor leaders of our own country have visited and attended these meetings. Public opinion is such, not only in our own country, but in many others, that the governing administration would not dare to flout the cause of labor by appointing representatives for the workers who would betray their principles and their ideals. So I must distinctly disagree with my colleagues who impugn the motives and the purposes of the I. L. O.

Incidentally, I wish to correct the impression concerning representation in the I. L. O. Each member or State represented is entitled to 4 representatives, 2 of whom shall be Government delegates and 1 representing the employers and another the workers of such State. Each delegate votes independently. The purpose being to give the Government 2 disinterested delegates to speak for all the people of that country and 1 each for the employers and the employed.

The I. L. O. is practically an independent organization and directs its own policies. Its general conference can make a recommendation if approved by two-thirds of the delegates. This recommendation may then be submitted to the legislative bodies of the nations represented. These nations may then ratify or reject the recommendation at will. Many of the ratifications of the I. L. O. pertain to problems within the jurisdiction of the respective States of the American Union and the States may ratify or reject the recommendations at will. To charge that this procedure would entangle our country in the political and territorial ambitions of Europe has no foundation.

Speaking of the results of the I. L. O., it may be said that perhaps they have not reached the expectations of the optimists friendly to the purposes of this organization. It may also be said that it has made achievements that undoubtedly are disappointing to the critics and the pessimists who have attacked its purposes and its motives. Here is a brief list of ratifications by the leading nations: Spain leads with 32, Belgium 23, Italy 21, Great Britain and France 18 each, Germany 17, Sweden 16, Netherlands 15, India 13, Japan 12, China 5. Nicaragua and Uruguay have made 30 ratifications each and Bulgaria 27: a total of 636 ratifications have been made to January 1935. This is indisputable evidence that progress has been made not only in Europe but in Latin America and in the Asiatic countries of India and Japan, where conditions prevail that are a menace to the workers in competing industries in every other nation of the world.

The advocacy of the 8-hour day has given hope and inspiration to the workers in every nation who are striving to reduce their unreasonable hours. In the beginning the goal was a 48-hour week, but now a militant minority are striving for a 40-hour week.

Another report states that the results achieved by the 1920 and 1921 maritime conventions are a legitimate ground for satisfaction. Each of them embodies a definite and necessary reform and each of them has been ratified and applied by a number of maritime countries. Twenty-eight nations have ratified the proposal fixing the minimum age for admission of young persons to employment as trimmers or stokers. This includes India, which is deserving of special attention. Also the proposal for the compulsory medical examination of children, and any persons employed at sea has been ratified by 26 countries. The payment of unemployment indemnity to seamen in the case of loss or foundering of the ship has been ratified by 21 countries. The proposal for establishing facilities for finding employment for seamen has been ratified by 30 countries. The proposal for fixing the age limit for night work for children at 18 years has been ratified by 30. The minimum age of 14 years for admission of children for employment in industry has been ratified by 26; concerning the employment of women during the night, has been ratified by 26; concerning the use of white lead in painting, has been ratified by 23. The 8-hour day, 21; 1 day of weekly rest, 24.

While the above achievements may fall far short of the wishes of a great multitude and, of course, must be disappointing to many labor leaders with high hopes and a worthy purpose, yet it must be admitted that the results so far have contributed to the welfare of millions of workers, many of whom are in competition with our own. It certainly is of great importance to the American worker to raise the standard of living, of wages, improve the sanitation, reduce the working hours, of his competitors in other lands. If we are to maintain a standard of living far above that of other countries, we must surround ourselves with a wall of isolation, or we should lend at least our moral support to lifting up the standard of workers everywhere. No patriotic American can consent for a moment to the reduction of our standard of living to the low basis of the European or Asiatic worker. It is to be regretted that many of our industries, while they may be above the European or Asiatic standard, are far too low to enable their workers to enjoy the comforts and the standard of living to which every American citizen is entitled.

Regardless of the caustic comments and the fears of my colleagues, the I. L. O. stands alone as the one official international agency for the improvement of labor conditions.

universal peace it is striking at the very root of the greatest evil which confronts the working people of all nations. Never was there a time in the history of the world when its working people are considering the injustices of economic and social life as at present. Throughout the world we find unemployment, the need of food and clothing and shelter; millions upon millions suffering for the common necessities of life; their health impaired by privation, the future of their children clouded and bedimmed.

The I. L. O. may be moving slowly, but it is a movement in the right direction. It is building a foundation and a common interest for the workers of the world. It is not limiting its benefits to a favored few, but it is an instrument for the masses of all countries.

As we review the pages of history we must feel ashamed and apologetic because of the neglect, the abuse, the exploitation of the worker and the ruthless violation of his every right to life, liberty, and pursuit of happiness.

A few years ago I stood at the foot of an Egyptian pyramid on the outskirts of Cairo. I was stunned by the magnitude of that achievement, but I refused to refresh my memory as to the unworthy author of that vast monument of stone. I could only recall the servitude, the burning backs, the dripping brows, the weary bodies driven by the lash to this stupendous toil. The Hanging Gardens of Babylon, even the Temple of Solomon, the classical beauties of Greece and Rome were wrung from the toil of the despised worker whose only place in life seems to have been to strive and struggle, groan and die for his cruel exploiter, the king, the emperor, the ruler, guided by selfish ambition and unrestrained cruelty.

Always, everywhere, even until the present day, in spite of our eloquent generalities of the rights and the brotherhood of man, the masses are still bearing the yoke of the exploiter. The privileged few revel in riches and extravagance, while those who produce this wealth suffer for the bare necessities of life.

The new deal has been a great inspiration to me, because it promises at least a hope for a brighter future. It gives promise of curbing the greed and righting the wrongs that have been suffered by those who have made this country what it is. It is the worker who has turned the wilds of America into fruitful farms. It is the worker who has delved into the mines and dared its darkened chambers for its mineral riches. It is the worker who has converted the forest into homes. It is the worker who supplies the country with its food and its comforts. It is the workers who have fought the battles and suffered the horrors of war.

The saddest hour in the history of America is the one in which millions of our people do not own their own homes, millions are unemployed, millions are suffering for food, for clothing, for shelter. The stupidity of it all is that on the other hand we have a great abundance and a privileged few who have fortunes far beyond their needs, who are burning with selfish greed to gather more and more; that these have profiteered by tariff laws, banking laws, corporation laws, monopolistic laws, and have entrenched themselves against those upon whom they prey.

My own philosophy is that every citizen of America is entitled to steady employment at a living wage, every mother is entitled to a home and health protection, every child to an education and an opportunity.

I am for the new deal because it is humanitarian; because it is just; because it has recognized the right of the worker to organize for a redress of grievances; because it has sought to establish a maximum of hours, a minimum wage, and has restrained child labor; because it is the proponent of old-age pensions, unemployment and health insurance; because it has sought to restrain the frenzy of speculation, the reign of gold, the stock exchange, to eliminate the promoters of fraudulent securities that have wiped out the savings of millions of our people. I have followed our great President and I am happy to do so as long as the new deal is looking forward. My greatest hope is that it will continue to go forward until every special privilege has been wiped In its efforts to establish social justice as a foundation for out and until we can really and truly say that we have established a democracy of "equal rights to all and special privileges to none."

The I. L. O. is a foundation stone upon which enlightened souls of every nation are attempting to build a new deal that will include in its blessings the forgotten man of this and future ages. It has given an impetus to the struggle for human rights and the brotherhood of man. It fortifies those outstanding souls who are crusading to establish a new era and a new order in which every man will have a happy part. The I. L. O. gives a new heart to those brave reformers who are crying out against the monopolization of wealth and resources and who are battling for the common good, the good of all. People everywhere are asking for a more abundant life and seeking a share of human rights.

Many people in California are giving attention to the epic program, to the Utopian ideals, to the share-thewealth proposal, and to the Townsend old-age-pension plan, all of which are protests against the privileged order by which a few have more than an abundance and the masses reduced to want and need. Politicians may deride, learned economists may doubt, and citizens denounce, but the crusade for social justice and economic reform must march onward. It is a dark day to our country and our civilization if dreams and hopes for a more abundant life cannot be realized by all.

Our ancestors were prompted to breast strange seas and to dare the wilderness of a new continent in order to achieve religious freedom. Our Colonial fathers threw off the yoke of empire and withstood the victorious legions of Great Britain to win political freedom. Now, we are entering into the third struggle for freedom, the greatest war of all wars, the greatest battle of all battles, the fight for economic freedom and social justice. Let us hope that this supreme conflict will follow the orderly processes of our constitutional Government and that we can achieve social and economic justice without drenching our fields with the blood of our patriots and our fellow men.

Like other great causes for freedom we must win this battle if our country is to endure and our civilization to progress. Our country today, menaced by the greed of the privileged, by the immense wealth of the few, with the privation and despair of the many, is facing the foe that has destroyed many nations in the past. This battle against privileged economics and social injustice is a civil crusade that can be waged and won on constitutional and Christian principles or we must admit that the brotherhood of man, the pursuit of life, liberty, and happiness, our democratic traditions, our constitutional assurances for the general welfare of the people, are but empty words and idle dreams. If we fail to correct the social and economic tendencies of the past, this age-old menace of the worker, this grinding down of the toiler, our country, of which we are so proud, must sink into the mire of inevitable obscurity that has swallowed the most glorified civilizations of the past.

Let me repeat, the fundamental purpose of the I. L. O. is to promote social justice, to secure the stability and peace of nations, to improve the conditions of the workers everywhere in the world. To secure these ends it is necessary to curb greed, to eradicate special privilege, to realize democracy—the will of all the people. "Equal rights to all, special privilege to none" is the golden rule of government and the fundamental principle of democracy.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. 31) to provide for the issuance of a license to practice the healing art in the District of Columbia to Dr. Chester C. Groff, and pass the same, an identical House bill having been passed on February 4.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the Senate bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That, notwithstanding any limitation relating to the time within which an application for a license must be filed, the Commission on Licensure to Practice the Healing Art in the District of Columbia is authorized and directed to issue a license to District of Columbia is authorized and directed to issue a license to practice the healing art in the District of Columbia to Dr. Chester C. CODE OF LAW FOR DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA RELATING TO DESCENT AND DISTRIBUTION

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 3464) to amend certain sections of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia, approved March 3, 1901, as amended, relating to descent and distribution.

The Clerk read as follows:

(B) Sections 941 to 951, inclusive, of such act, as amended (D. C. Code, title 25, secs. 232 to 242, inclusive), are hereby repealed. Sec. 4. Section 954 of such act, as amended (D. C. Code, title 25, sec. 245), is amended to read as follows:

"Sec. 954. In no case shall there be any distinction between the kindred of the whole- and the half-blood."

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, the proposed bill would simply destroy the distinction existing in present law between male and female ancestors and descendants. In other words, it would bring this law in line with the States and up to present-day conditions. It has been discussed and approved by the District Commissioners, and is endorsed by all of the important organizations in the District.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the street designated as Lefler Place NW., running north from Oglethorpe Street to Peabody Street NW., be, and the same is hereby, changed to Second Place, thereby conforming to the general practice in the naming of short streets of this character in the District of Columbia.

With the following committee amendments:

In line 3 strike out the word "Lefler" and insert in lieu thereof "Leffler"; in line 4, strike out the word "running" and insert in lieu thereof the word "running."

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the lady from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, Trinity College is now attempting to operate under a certification of incorporation filed in 1897 under the provisions of subchapter 1 of chapter 18 of the Code of Laws of the District of Columbia. The articles of incorporation were drawn with little view to the future development of the college. As this is one of the largest and most progressive women's colleges in the country, with a student body drawn from every section of the country, and considering the importance of Trinity College as an institution of higher education for women, the inadequacy of the present articles of incorporation, and the fact that similar legislation has been passed for the benefit of such institutions as Columbus, Georgetown, George Washington, National, and Catholic Universities, Trinity College is entitled to whatever advantage it may receive.

Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mrs. Norton for the Committee on the District of Columbia: Page 5, line 4, strike out the word "section" and insert in lieu thereof the word "act."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ESTATES OF ABSENTEES AND ABSCONDERS

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill H. R. 83, to provide for the conservation and settlement of estates of absentees and absconders in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, and ask unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That if a person entitled to or having an interest in property in the District of Columbia has disappeared or absconded from the District of Columbia, and it is not known where he is, or if such person, having a wife or minor child de-pendent to any extent upon him for support, has disappeared or absconded without making sufficient provision for such support, and it is not known where he is, or, if it is known that he is without the District of Columbia, anyone who would under the law of the District of Columbia be entitled to administer upon the estate of such absentee if he were deceased, or if no one is known to be so of such absentee if he were deceased, of if no one is known to be so entitled, any suitable person, or such wife, or someone in her or such minor's behalf, may file a petition under oath in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, sitting in equity, stating the name, age, occupation, and last-known residence or address of such absentee, the date and circumstances of the disappearance or such absentee, the date and circumstances of the disappearance or absconding, and the names and residence of other persons, whether members of such absentee's family or otherwise, of whom inquiry may be made, and containing a schedule of his property, real and personal, so far as known, within the District of Columbia, and praying that such property may be taken possession of and a receiver thereof appointed under the provisions of this act. The United States attorney in and for the District of Columbia shall be made a party to every such petition and shall be given due notice of all subsequent proceedings under this law.

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment. The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CARPENTER: Page 1, line 9, after the word "is" where it appears the second time, strike out the remaining part of the sentence and all of line 1, page 2, except the words "anyone who", and insert in lieu thereof the following: "or, if his whereabouts is known, has been out of the District of Columbia continuously for 1 year or longer."

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. Speaker, there are a great many people resident in the District of Columbia who travel a great deal over the world. Many Federal employees domiciled in Washington are assigned to different parts of the world, to Alaska, to the Philippine Islands, to Europe, and elsewhere. They may be gone for 3 months or a year. Under the provisions of this bill as it now stands if a man had any domestic trouble, then after he had left the District of Columbia on one of these assignments and had been gone a week an ex parte proceeding could be commenced against him in court upon the petition of his wife or someone in her behalf; and then after only 3 weeks' publication of notice a receiver could be appointed to take charge of all his property. This would happen whether they knew where he was or not.

My amendment is offered merely for the purpose of preventing such a thing happening where a person has left the District of Columbia and his whereabouts are known and he has not resided here continuously for 1 year, then this proceeding can be brought. I think he should have at least this protection, that such an action could not be commenced within a year. I do not think there is any objection to the amendment.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, the committee accepts the amendment.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to the amendment for the purpose of suggesting to the gentleman that the period of time in his amendment should be made 2 years instead of 1 year. I make the suggestion for the reason that this is essentially a receivership bill, and provides for the filing of a petition for the purpose of having a receiver appointed in order to satisfy the demands of creditors, to satisfy any demands for alimony, or to satisfy any demands that there may be for the maintenance and relief of the wife and children who may reside here in the District. If we are not careful to make the time long enough the act is liable to abuse. Knowing a little something about the receivership business, I am afraid that 1 year is not long enough, and I suggest to the gentleman, very informally, that the time ought to be made 2 years.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman vield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. The gentleman realizes, of course, that during that period of time the wife who has been deserted cannot obtain alimony. I think 2 years is altogether too long a period.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I would suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. Speaker, that for every case of such a nature there will be a dozen cases where the receivership will be abused if the time is not made sufficiently long.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. But this is not a receivership bill for ordinary creditors; it is a receivership bill for the purpose of securing alimony payments to the wife and dependent children.

Mr. DIRKSEN. The gentleman knows, however, that the bill specifically recites that those who have a claim of record can come in under this bill.

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. Speaker, I modify my amendment as suggested by the gentleman from Illinois and make the period of time 2 years instead of 1 year.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment, as modified.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Sec. 2. The court may thereupon issue a warrant directed to the United States marshal in and for the District of Columbia, comomited States marshal in and for the District of Columbia, commanding him to take possession of the property named in said schedule and hold it subject to the order of the court and make return of said warrant as soon as may be, with a statement of his actions thereon and a schedule of the property so taken. The marshal shall post a copy of the warrant upon each parcel of land named in the schedule and cause so much of the warrant as relates to land to be recorded with the recorder of deeds of the District of Columbia. He shall receive such fees for serving the warrant as the court allows, but not more than those established by law for similar service upon a writ of attachment. If the petition is dismissed, said fees and the cost of publishing and serving the notice hereinafter provided shall be paid by the petitioner; but if a receiver is appointed, they shall be paid by the receiver and allowed in his account.

SEC. 3. Upon the return of such warrant, the court may issue a SEC. 3. Upon the return of such warrant, the court may issue a notice reciting the substance of the petition, the warrant, and the marshal's return, which shall be addressed to such absentee and to all persons who claim an interest in said property, and to all whom it may concern, citing them to appear at a time and place named and show cause why a receiver of the property named in the marshal's schedule should not be appointed and said property held and disposed of under the provisions of this act.

With the following committee amendments:

On page 3, line 16, after the word "claim", insert the words "of record"; and on page 3, line 17, after the word "property", insert the words "or who are known to petitioner to claim an interest in said property."

The committee amendments were agreed to. The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. The return day of said notice shall be not less than 30 nor more than 60 days after its date. The court shall order said notice to be published once in each of 3 successive weeks in one or more newspapers within the District of Columbia, and a copy to be posted in a conspicuous place and upon each parcel of land named in the marshal's schedule, and a copy to be mailed to the last known address of such absentee. The court may order other and further notice to be given within or without the District of Columbia. Columbia.

With the following committee amendments:

On page 3, line 24, after the word "date", insert the words "unless otherwise ordered by the court"; and on page 4, line 1, after the word "published", insert the words "not less than."

The committee amendments were agreed to. The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. The absentee or any person who claims an interest in any SEC. 5. If a receiver is appointed the court shall find and record the date of the disappearance or absconding of the absentee; and such receiver shall give bond to said court in such sum and with such condition as the court orders, with a corporate surety thereon approved by the court orders, with a corporate surety thereon approved by the court.

Sec. 6. After the approval of such bond the court may order the praying that a receiver thereof may be appointed. The court may thereupon issue a notice as above provided, without issuing a warrant, and may, upon the return of said notice and after a summary hearing, dismiss the petition or appoint a receiver and The court may summary hearing, dismiss the petition or appoint a receiver and authorize and direct him to demand and collect the debts and obligations specified in said petition. The receiver shall give bond as provided in section 5, and shall hold the proceeds of such debts and obligations and all property received by him, and distribute the same as hereinafter provided. Sec. 10. The court may order said property or its proceeds acquired by mortgage, lease, or sale to be applied in payment of charges incurred or that may be incurred in the support and maintenance of the absentee's wife and minor children, and to the discharge of such debts and claims for alimony as may be

If such absentee does not appear and claim said property within such 14 years, all his right, title, and interest in said property, real or personal, or the proceeds thereof shall cease, and no action shall be brought by him on account thereof.

PENSIONS FOR BLIND PERSONS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 5711) to provide pensions for needy blind persons of the District of Columbia and authorizing appropriations therefor, and ask unanimous consent that this bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Board of Public Welfare of the District of Columbia (hereinafter called the "Board") is hereby authorized and directed to enforce the provisions of this act for the purpose of maintaining, supporting, and caring for needy blind persons, residents of the said District of Columbia, citizens of the United States, and not inmates of any institution supported in whole or in part by the Federal or District Governments, and said Board shall have the power to make and enforce all proper rules and regulations therefor, and said Board shall entrust the carrying out of the provisions of this act to its Public Assistance Division under the supervision of a standing subcommittee of said Board, at least one of whom shall be a woman.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word in order to interrogate the chairman of the committee. May I ask the gentlewoman from New Jersey if the President has agreed to sign this bill if enacted into law?

Mrs. NORTON. I understand the President will sign the bill. The objections which the President had to the bill last year have been removed. The objections were minor, and were principally because the Commissioners had not at that time approved the bill. We now have a letter from the Commissioners approving the bill.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. The reason I ask the guestion is because a delegation of blind people came to my office some time ago and presented me with an almost exact duplicate of this bill. I immediately got in touch with Mr. McIntyre to see if the President would sign the bill.

Mr. McIntyre told me to contact Mr. Bell, of the Budget Bureau. Mr. Bell was away for about a week, and I waited until he returned, but in the meantime this bill was introduced. I interviewed the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ELLENBOGEN], and he was not positive about Mr. Bell's being in favor of the bill. I wish to say that I am not. I think it is a very obnoxious piece of legislation, and I am opposed to it.

Mrs. NORTON. Why are you opposed to it?

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. For various reasons.

Mrs. NORTON. Name the reasons.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. In order for a blind person to get this pension, he has to be a pauper. A blind person should not be submitted to any more embarrassment than any other person who is to receive a pension from the Government.

Mrs. NORTON. Is not that true in getting any pension? Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. No; it is not. There are many persons who receive pensions from the Federal Government and the State government who do not have to pauperize themselves. I cannot understand why the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Ellenbogen] presented this bill. Last year a bill of this type was passed, and the President vetoed it.

Mrs. NORTON. May I say to the gentleman that the blind people of the District of Columbia, for whose benefit this bill was introduced, entirely approve of this bill, and it seems to the committee they are the people most concerned with respect to the measure, and may I further say that it is my understanding the bill is now acceptable to the President.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. May I inform the gentlewoman from New Jersey that blind people came to my office and told me to do my utmost to defeat the bill.

Mrs. NORTON. As chairman of the committee I may say that it seems extraordinary to me they would come to the gentleman's office instead of the office of the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. The reason the blind came to me was because they knew I have been active in the affairs of the blind for many years. I was one of a number of blind persons who helped to make it possible to have the constitution of Pennsylvania amended so that the sightless of that State could obtain a pension.

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. NICHOLS. I may say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that I was a member of the subcommittee which had this bill up for hearing. We had several days' hearing on it, and the committee rooms for those 2 or 3 days were literally filled with blind people from the District of Columbia testifying in favor of the bill and imploring us, as a subcommittee, to report it out favorably to the main committee and finally to the floor of the House.

I may also say to the gentleman that during all of these days of hearings there was not a single blind person who appeared in opposition to the measure.

I want also to say to the gentleman that I agree with him in that perhaps the bill does not have all the desired features, but in the best interests of the blind who appeared there it seems to me this is as good as we can expect at this time, and I should like to have the gentleman not oppose it, but let us pass it like this, and then we can go along and work on it further.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. In reply to the gentleman, may I say that I know the committee is actuated by humanitarian motives, but when the gentleman says the blind appeared before the committee I wish to state they were interested in a real pension bill. If you were to compare the number of blind who appeared before your committee asking for this particular pension bill with the number that are opposed to this particular bill, your number would be very small.

Mr. NICHOLS. May I say to the gentleman that the testimony was there were some 300 blind in the District of Columbia that this bill would affect.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. I absolutely agree that it will affect at least 300 blind people.

Mr. NICHOLS. And I may say to the gentleman I believe I would be conservative in saying that 75 people appeared in favor of the legislation, while not a single one appeared against it.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. I may say to the gentleman that the blind want a pension, but they want a better bill than this. I would not stand up here and oppose any legislation that is going to benefit the blind or any other class of unfortunates, but I want them to get the best that is obtainable.

The Clerk read as follows:

Sec. 10. No person shall be eligible to the benefits of this act who shall hereafter either intentionally deprive himself of his eyewho shall hereafter either intentionally deprive himself of his eyesight or assist in the destruction thereof by others; or hereafter shall lose his eyesight during the perpetration of a criminal offense; or shall hereafter lose his eyesight by reason of vicious habits; or through hereafter indulging in so-called "alcoholic beverages"; Provided, That no payment of any money shall be made under this act for the care or relief of any blind person who has for 5 years preceding his blindness or loss of sight been dependent upon public relief unless such dependency shall have been caused through physical or mental incapacity or the general economic depression.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentlewoman from New Jersey another question with respect to the section of the bill which states, if I interpret it correctly, that if a man goes blind because of drinking alcoholic beverages, he will not be eligible for a pension.

Mrs. NORTON. I am going to ask the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. Nichols], who was a member of the sub-committee that conducted hearings on this bill, to answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman please explain that part of the bill which states that if a person goes blind because of drinking alcoholic beverages he will not be eligible for this pension?

Mr. NICHOLS. I cannot explain it to the gentleman except to say that that is the provision of the bill.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. In other words, if a man goes into a place to buy some liquor and the liquor is being sold by a legitimate business man, and this man, although having the best intentions in selling the best of liquor, yet may have in his possession a bottle which is not good and sells it to a man and he afterward loses his sight, because he lost his sight in this way he would not be eligible for a pension under this act.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. TRUAX. What about the man who would buy liquor from a bootlegger who is irresponsible and then loses his sight?

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. I cannot see where there would be any necessity to buy liquor from a bootlegger if they would bring down the price of good liquor.

Mr. TRUAX. I do not know about that. The bootleggers have been operating for 20 years.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. That is not an answer to my question.

Mr. TRUAX. If the gentleman will yield further, I may say to the gentleman, for whom I have the greatest respect, I am heartily in sympathy with an equitable and a good pension bill for the blind, the gentleman has stated that this is not the best bill, what would be the best bill?

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. I would suggest to the gentleman, whom I know to be humane, to provide the blind of | lumbia for further consideration.

the District with an adequate pension without strings tied to it, and arrange it so that it will not be necessary to have some social worker running to his house and looking into his ice box to see if he has any rotton onions in it before he may be considered eligible for a pension.

Mr. NICHOLS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. NICHOLS. Will the gentleman suggest an amendment?

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. I have already introduced a better bill.

Mr. WOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. WOOD. Does the gentleman call drinking alcohol

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. They call it misconduct: I

Mr. WOOD. I think the primary sentence. " or shall hereafter lose his eyesight by reason of vicious habits" is suffi-cient, and we should strike out "or through hereafter indulging in so-called 'alcoholic beverages.'"

Mrs. NORTON. Will the gentleman offer that amend-

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend, on page 7, line 2, by striking out, after the semicolon, the words "or through hereafter indulging in so-called 'alcoholic beverages.'

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment. The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. Woon moves to amend, on page 7, line 2, by striking out the words "or through hereafter indulging in so-called 'alcoholic beverages.'"

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

The question was taken, and the motion was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The bill was passed.

On motion of Mrs. Norton, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert at this point some remarks on the bill just passed, and include therein a tabular analysis of State laws.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Mr. Speaker, during the course of the present session of Congress this House will, no doubt, pass many bills which in scope, significance to the country as a whole, and amount of appropriations called for will be more important than the measure we are considering now. But I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the Members of the House of Representatives, that there will be no bill before us more humane, more just, and more worthy of enactment than this same measure.

The purpose of this bill is to appropriate funds sufficient to insure a decent and secure life for the needy blind of the District of Columbia. I believe it is not necessary to argue the merits of such a purpose. They are self-evident, and will, I am sure, be conceded by everyone here.

I should like, however, to emphasize several points which were taken into consideration when the provisions of this bill were drawn up. First of all, let me say, and I cannot emphasize this point too strongly, this bill is not charity. It is not an emergency measure. It is not a dole. On the contrary, it provides for the establishment of a permanent system of administering, in a dignified manner which will cause no embarrassment to the recipients, the needs of those people who, handicapped by blindness, have not been able to support themselves.

I stress this point because I was so much impressed by the emphasis which was placed upon it by a number of the people who testified before the District of Columbia subcommittee which considered the bill. Both the blind people themselves, who came before the committee, and the representatives of various organizations and associations interested in work among the blind asked that this bill be considered altogether as a social measure, consistent with sound and progressive principles of the relationship and responsibilities of a community to the various elements in the community.

These people are indeed to be complimented on this attitude. It is an admirable one and representative, I believe, of the courage and fortitude with which those who are suffering the greatest handicap possible in life are striving to meet the great burden thrust upon them. They are setting a noble example to the rest of the world.

This bill was drawn along such lines—as a social measure. The blind themselves would spurn this bill if its purpose were otherwise. We have for this reason excluded from the benefits of the bill certain groups of blind people who are self-supporting either through an assured income or through employment or work which guarantees a steady livelihood and those who are supported by others who are able to do so.

It is to the rest of the blind in the District that this bill applies. Unless they receive the aid proposed in the bill before us, the only alternative for them is to enter some institution or home. It is the most cruel thing that we could doto deprive them of the few dollars which would permit them to remain at home decently cared for. More and more we are progressing away from this system of relegation of worthwhile members of society to the almshouse and poorhouse. For, with all due respect to the good work many of these institutions undoubtedly accomplish, it is not right; and it is not sound, either from a social or economic point of view, to separate people from their loved ones, to remove them from all which is near and dear to them.

The most humane and the soundest way is to provide the means whereby these people can stay in their own homes and can be cared for by those whom they have grown to trust and love. That is the purpose of this bill—to have these people remain in their own surroundings, to continue their associations and interests, and at the same time to banish from their minds forever the overhanging pall of economic insecurity.

Indeed, it is to be regretted that we have not enacted such legislation for the District of Columbia long before this. It is only reasonable to suppose and expect that the Congress of the United States, enacting as it does legislation for the good and welfare of the entire country, would give the District of Columbia, which it actually governs, the first benefits of all progressive legislation. I should like to see the District become the example to be set before all the rest of the country in matters pertaining to the social and economic betterment of the United States.

So far we have not maintained such a policy. At the present time 25 States have already enacted laws of various types to care for their blind people. I have a tabular analysis of these State laws comparing the several provisions of each, and I should like to present it at this point.

Mr. Speaker, I can only add that I hope that this bill will be passed without a dissenting vote. I believe it is a good bill. Every effort has been made to provide for the needs of the blind, in as adequate a measure as possible. All of the money will be spent on the blind themselves, and nothing will go for administrative or executive costs.

The bill has been endorsed by leading civic and social organizations in the District of Columbia. The spokesmen for organizations doing work among the blind are in favor of it. It has the approval of the intended beneficiaries, who feel that it meets their needs. The Board of Commissioners of the District of Columbia have formally notified the House District Committee of their approbation of this measure. I now present the letter of the Commissioners:

COMMISSIONERS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA EXECUTIVE OFFICE. Washington, February 14, 1935.

Hon. HENRY ELLENBOGEN.

House of Representatives, Washington, D. C. EAR SIE: The Commissioners of the District of Columbia have DEAR SIR: considered the attached proposed amendment to H. R. 4510, being a bill to provide pensions for needy blind persons of the District of Columbia, which you have introduced in the House of Representatives, and find that these amendments remove all objections except the one of finances which were originally raised to this bill except the one of finances which were originally raised to this bill by the Commissioners.

The Commissioners understand that the proposal for taking as many classes of people off the relief rolls as possible, by providing special forms of assistance on the basis of special needs, is in accordance with the policy of the Federal administration, and therefore give their approval to this bill as amended, subject to the making available of the necessary funds.

The Commissioners desire to thank you for your foresight and energy as exemplified in this bill and for your courtesy in giving them the opportunity of discussing the original bill with you, through their representative, the Director of Public Welfare.

Very respectfully,

BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, By M. C. HAZEN, President.

By M. C. HAZEN, President.

Socially, morally, and economically, this is a sound measure. Let us pass it unanimously.

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was on objection.

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Speaker, since I have been a Member of this House I have contended that there are many constructive things which could be done to be helpful to various groups of people in this country, especially the agricultural groups, all of which, to my mind, would tend to do away with temporary measures, subsidies, and so forth. Inasmuch as farmers are unorganized and are unable financially to do many constructive things in connection with their line of endeavor, it is my contention that the Government of the United States should undertake to do these things which, I am sure, will prove not only of great interest and assistance to agriculture but to every other line of business and every other class of people in this country. Under legislation passed by the Congress, we have plowed under 4,000,000 bales of perfectly good American cotton. Today we are engaged in a scheme of reducing production, paying farmers special benefits for so doing at the expense of all the taxpayers of the country. I do not object to these special benefits for the reason that they are in line with a tariff policy which has been in force all of these years in the interest of wellorganized groups. I contend, also, if we are going to continue to tax consumers under the present tariff policy for the benefit of industry and labor—although I do not believe labor receives much of these benefits-certainly agriculture should be placed on the same basis.

Some days ago I introduced a bill (H. R. 4748) to provide for research work in connection with the utilization of southern agricultural products, other than forest products, particularly whole cotton, as follows:

That in order to permit the Secretary of Agriculture to establish an experiment station for the purpose of conducting experiments, research, investigations, and tests with respect to the chemical, physical, and physiological properties and utilization and preservation of southern agricultural products as bagasse. and preservation of southern agricultural products as bagasse, cotton stalk, cottonseed, and motes, cotton hulls, cotton lint and linters, rice straws, and particularly the collection, harvesting, preservation, and industrial utilization of whole cotton as a raw material for the manufacture of cellulose, not as lint cotton, there is hereby authorized to be appropriated such amounts as may be necessary to erect necessary buildings and laboratories, finance work, and provide initial equipment therefor in the South, and provide in the south of the at a cost not to exceed $150,000, and to operate for the fiscal year

SEC. 2. In carrying out the provisions of this act the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to cooperate with individuals originating whole-cotton investigations, public and private agencies, organizations, and institutions in the United States, and to accept on behalf of the United States such title to or loan of or lease of land which he may deem appropriate for the research in connection with such an experiment station.

Szc. 3. There are hereby authorized to be appropriated annually such amounts as may be necessary for the maintenance, supplies, equipment, and work of such experiment station, and for use in connection with such experiment station.

The whole-cotton plant-leaves, lint, bolls, and burs thereon—as shown by chemical tests, is rich in cellulose. Cellulose is the main raw material used in the manufacture of rayons, papers, photographic films, paints and plastics, cellophane, guncotton, and many other industrial products. The cellulose that is now used in the United States is derived mainly from spruce wood, imported from Finland, Norway, Sweden, Canada, and some other countries in small quantities.

In the manufacture of cellulose from the cotton plant, the entire plant, as stated, is utilized. When the plant has reached its maturity, even at the stage of gathering the lint cotton, it is harvested in a manner similar to harvesting hay. The plant is cut down, having never been picked of cotton, dried, and baled in the field. This raw material is then ready to be manufactured into cellulose in competition with spruce and other raw material.

The harvesting and the manufacture of cellulose from whole cotton in competition with the imported cellulose from spruce has been the object of considerable investigation on a small scale. The research was started at Rockingham, N. C., in 1929, where it was carried on until 1930, when it was taken to the University of North Carolina, at Chapel Hill. For 5 years the work was alternatingly done at the university and at Rockingham. The Rockefeller Foundation donated X-ray equipment and the American Cotton Growers Association financed the work for 1 year. Since that time the investigation has been limited in scope and progressing slowly due to inadequate facilities and financing.

At the present time the investigation has reached the point where the small test-tube scale of work is not sufficient. The results so far obtained definitely indicate that large-scale tests must be made. To indicate properly the methods which must be used in the manufacture of whole cotton into cellulose in large industrial plants more accurate pulping and bleaching experiments must be made. These can only be made on a larger scale than has heretofore been possible, not only at Rockingham and the University of North Carolina, but in laboratories under the supervision of the Department of Agriculture and the Bureau of Standards here in Washington.

In considering the cotton plant as a possible source of valuable cellulose, it was found that lint cotton, which is about 95 percent pure cellulose, would be too expensive to use alone. The cotton stalk contains about 43 percent cellulose, and due to the processing and low yield of pure cellulose obtained, also becomes too expensive as a possible source. But by the use of the stalk, lint, and other parts of the cotton plant a cellulose is recovered which points toward an economical competition of whole cotton with spruce and other materials as a source of cellulose. It is true that the rich yield of cellulose in the lint cotton is materially reduced, but at the same time the low yield of the stalk is apparently raised and the resulting raw material yield is approximately 50 percent pure cellulose. Spruce wood yields, as a high, about 52 percent cellulose.
